INTRODUCTION

TO THE NEW-YORK EDITION.

THE author of this work was the Rev. James Duncan, a learned and faithful minister of the Gospel in Indiana, and father of the Hon. Alexander Duncan, now member of Congress from Cincinnati. It is a matter of regret, that a letter from the West, containing some further particulars respecting the author and his labors, has been mislaid and cannot be found. However, the work will speak for itself, wherever it shall be read, and will show its author to have been a man of uncommon powers of reasoning, and of uncommon clearness of vision, for his day, on the subject of slavery and abolition. The work was first published, as the title imports, at Vevay, in the state of Indiana, in the year 1834, and was accompanied by the following

RECOMMENDATION

This treatise has been highly recommended by several gentlemen of Kentucky and Indiana—the publisher selects, for the present, the following letter from Jesse L. Holman, Esq. one of the judges of the supreme court of Indiana, a gentleman well known to the citizens of this and the neighboring States.

"I have been favored, for a few hours, with the manuscript of a 'TREATISE ON SLAVERY,' by the Rev. James Duncan, and from a hasty perusal of the greater part of its contents, and the well known abilities of the author, I conceive it to be executed with a depth of thought and force of argument, that well deserves the attention of all inquirers after moral truth, and justly merits the patronage of the public."

PREFACE.

THE object of the present work, is not so much to render odious the cruel treatment of slaves, as to discuss the principle of slaveholding, and to show forth the iniquity of the practice. The cruel treatment of slaves has been often exposed to public view, by many able hands, who have also by judicious arguments refuted the most specious apologies that have been advanced in favor of the principle. Yet, that the principle or moral ground upon which slavery is practiced in the world, has been too lightly touched by modern writers, is manifest from two concessions, which most of them appear to admit. The first is, that slavery was authorized by the judicial law under the Old Testament. The second is, that the emancipation of slaves need not to be sudden, but gradual, lest the possessors of them should be too much impoverished, and lest the free inhabitants might be exposed to danger, if the blacks were all liberated at once.

If the first of these concessions is admitted as just, namely, that if slavery in its present form was allowed of under the Old Testament, the practice may be defended under the New, because every precept of the judicial law, must have had the moral law for its basis, so as in no respect to contradict it. If then slavery in its present form was morally just under the Old Testament, it must be just under the New, for the moral law is as unchangeable as God himself.

If the second of these concessions is just, to wit : the emancipation of slaves ought not to be sudden, but gradual, to prevent the penal evils of poverty and other distresses which might accrue to the inhabitants in general ; it will go to justify the practice of slaveholding, because the only motive that men can have to practice slavery, is that it may be a means of preventing poverty and other penal evils. If the fear of poverty or any penal sufferings will exculpate the possessors of slaves from blame, for a few months or years, it will do it for life ; and if some may be lawfully held to labor without wages, all may be held the same way ; and if the principle of slavery is morally wrong, it ought not to be practiced to avoid any penal evil, but if just, even the cruel treatment of slaves would not condemn the practice. The subject then which at this time calls forth the utmost exertions of the friends of humanity, is the great criminality of slaveholding, or to shew the extreme guilt of that man who occupies the office and station of a slaveholder although he should treat his slaves with the utmost humanity as slaves. Agreeable to these remarks, the following treatise will be introduced with an inquiry concerning the moral law, considered as the law of nature, which binds all men to act conformably to its precepts, and condemns every practice or habit, that is not in every respect agreeable to its dictates. Then, in order to prepare the subject for an impartial examination, will be given a definition of slavery, with a delineation of the office and power of a slaveholder. If any reader should feel disposed to call in question the correctness of those definitions, let him suspend his judgment till he turns over to the appendix at the close of this work, where he will find some extracts from the laws of Kentucky and Virginia relative to slaves, which will prove those definitions to be perfectly correct.

This attempt to overthrow the principle of slavery will consist of some abstract demonstrations, and some plain scriptural arguments. Those of the abstract kind will be twenty-nine in number, every one of which, it is hoped, if carefully examined, will be found to be conclusive. One argument, if fair and just, is sufficient to establish a position, with an enlightened and unprejudiced mind ; but when we consider that many readers are the opposite of both, a subject may be of that importance, as to require all the collective force of argumentation that can be mustered to lead such to conviction. As the subject of slavery is of the highest importance, and deeply concerns the temporal and eternal states of men, it merits the greatest attention, and will call for a proportional degree of demonstration, both from scripture and abstract principles, to convince the guilty of its criminality.

The design of this work is to persuade all that are engaged in the business of holding their fellow creatures in a state of unmerited involuntary slavery, that they are guilty of a crime, not only of the highest aggravation, but one, that if persisted in, will inevitably lead them to perdition.

INTRODUCTION.

IN attempting to justify or condemn any act or practice, it cannot be amiss, in the first instance, to ascertain whether the matter of the thing required or forbidden, is moral or indifferent. If it is moral, it cannot be optional with us either to do it or not. For example : speaking truth is moral and not indifferent, therefore it cannot be optional with us to either speak truth or falsehood ; but the moral law binds us to speak truth, every man to his neighbor. If the matter of the thing be indifferent, as that of eating certain kinds of food, it may be either right or wrong, according to the circumstances. If the practice of slaveholding is of a moral nature, and not indifferent, the rule by which we are to judge of it must be the moral law, and not either human laws, customs, habits, temporal ease, peace or safety. That slaveholding, whether right or wrong, is moral and not indifferent, there can be no dispute ; every person, then, who is seriously disposed to know his duty relative to the practice, will compare it with the moral law, and form his judgment by that unerring rule ; and any one attempting to investigate the subject, with a design to either justify or condemn it, must take the moral law for his chief guide. This method we shall adopt ; that is, to open up the nature of the moral law, and lay it down as the foundation or rock upon which we purpose the following scheme of argumentation shall rest.

OF THE MORAL LAW.

The great end for which God made man was, that he should glorify God and enjoy him forever. By God's end in making man, we are to understand the proper motive to which he directed him by his law, and made it his indispensable duty and great privilege to attain.

The rule which God gave to man when he created him, and which still binds him to glorify and enjoy him forever, is called the moral law. The moral law is a transcript of the divine character ; it forbids all sin, as being contrary to the holy nature of God, and binds all men to the performance of every duty relating to God, and every duty relating to men.

ing to the relation in which they stand to him, and an inalienable right to do all relative duties to one another, without being hindered by any human authority, which rights imply all the characteristics of freemen, considered as subjects of civil government. In contending for freedom, in opposition to slavery, we design to plead for no more than those rights of duty to God, and rights of relative duties which mankind owe to one another.

These views of the rights of man, are by no means at variance with a man's right to transfer to another his personal freedom, as respects his labor, for a time, or for life, which any man may sell as well as his other property, but it will condemn any attempt to sell his right of duty to God, or any private relative duties which he owes to mankind, both of which are inalienable.

QUERY.—Whether the civil law of any government can be the supreme rule of duty?

ANSWER.—The supreme rule of duty must be the moral law, but not the civil law, neither ought civil requisitions to be regarded, if found to be contrary to the moral law. If the civil law was the supreme rule, it would not admit the moral law to have any authority, further than it might be made subservient to the civil law.

2. It would suppose a people prior to their political constitution, or to the existence of civil law among them, to be without law; and that the representatives of a nation, while framing a constitution, and making laws to be above and out of the reach of all law, both divine and human, so as to have no moral rule to bind them, to make the constitution and laws good and just.

3. It would suppose the people to be obliged to adopt that constitution, and submit to the laws, however cruel and tyrannical.

4. It would suppose every constitution and laws, made by representatives, to be perfectly just, and the representatives themselves to be infallible men, for as sure as we admit a civil rule to be wrong, it supposes a law of higher authority which denounces it wrong. Or if we admit that representatives are fallible men, it supposes a law that they are liable to transgress in instituting civil laws, which can be none other than the moral law. Therefore the civil law cannot be the supreme rule of duty to any people, but the supreme rule of duty is the moral law, which is before every law, and is that eternal and unchangeable rule, which is binding upon all men, to which every human law ought to be conformed, or else it is sinful. Says Cicero—"There is not one moral law for Rome, another for Athens, and another for Sparta, but one moral law is equally binding on all nations."

These fundamental principles being laid down, we shall attempt an investigation of the subject proposed.

SLAVERY.

IN discussing this subject it will be proper,

I. To define slavery.

II. To give a brief history of servitude in general.

III. Show, by a course of argumentation, that slaveholding is condemned by the word of God, and contrary to the law of nature ; and,

IV. Try to point out the duty of both emancipators and others in relation to the practice.

CHAPTER I.

I. SLAVERY DEFINED.

By slavery we do not intend such servants as might voluntarily bind or indenture themselves for any term, or for life, nor the subjects of kings or princes, who are frequently called servants, nor such servants as might bind themselves for any term ; nor do we intend soldiers, who are often called servants, nor those who may have been or may be condemned for certain crimes and sold for servants, nor those who might have agreed to have been sold for a term of years, to pay their passage from one country to another, nor such as were taken prisoners in war and sold for slaves during life, which it appears was customary in ancient eastern countries, and among the Greeks were called servants under the yoke. But by slavery, we mean that of involuntary, unmerited, perpetual, hereditary slavery, without any conditions or limitations, or supposed crimes to be a legal cause for that involuntary slavery. By slaves we mean such beings of the human race as are, with their offspring, to perpetual generations, considered as PROPERTY; compelled by superior force, unconditionally to obey their owners, liable to be given and received; to go and to come; to marry or forbear; to be separated when married; to eat, drink, sleep, labor, and be beaten at the discretion of their masters; this is slavery.

With slaveholders we do not class all that have the persons of slaves in their power, for some have them that are making conscience of educating them, and are disposed at some future time to set them at liberty. Others may not have come to a full discovery of the sin of holding slaves, yet are laying their minds open to conviction, and are striving, by reading, meditation, and prayer, to know their duty relative to the business of slavery. A real slaveholder is one who not only has the persons of slaves in his power, but has a full determination to retain them in bondage, and to bequeath them and their posterity to his succeeding heirs. By a slaveholder we mean one who has a power, without any control of man, to contravene all the preceptive obligations of the divine law relative to the slave, to intercept and prevent all the relative duties which he owes to God and to his relations and neighbors. In short, it is a power over all those private inalienable rights and relative duties, which no civil authority upon earth has either a right to tolerate or prevent. It is no just objection to this definition of a slaveholder's power, that the laws of some slave states will punish the man who kills his slave, because the same law admits him to exercise all that unlimited power which has been described, while the slave is alive, but takes no cognizance of his case till after he is killed.

APPENDAGES OF SLAVERY.

There are three things which are not in every possible case essential to the being of slavery, yet are essential to its permanent existence, and to the stability of that government which authorises slavery. The first is, that the slaves must be kept in a state of ignorance of every species or branch of literature, to prevent them from being able to plead their right to freedom, and to prevent them from contriving any successful methods to escape from bondage.

The second is, the necessity of all slaves being outlawed, or excluded from the privilege of bearing testimony in any court, for or against any free man. This lays them open to all possible abuses which human depravity might suggest, and in particular subjects the female slaves to the lawless will of the master, to become his prostitutes at discretion.

The third thing is, that in the economy of slavery, no respect can, in ordinary cases, be had to any relation, nor to private relative duties; but the authority of the master comes in prior to any relative obligation. Though some masters may permit their slaves to live with their relations, and allow them the exercise of some relative duties, yet all these rights and privileges are liable to be suspended at the discretion of the master.

CHAPTER II.

HISTORY OF SERVITUDE.

II. A brief history of servitude.

THE ANTEDILUVIANS.

The first intimation of slavery is in Genesis vi. 11. "The earth also was corrupt before God, and the earth was filled with violence." The business of slavery is not here mentioned, but it seems to be implied in the general expression. The earth was filled with violence, which is again repeated in the 13th verse. Violence signifies a forcible usurpation of power over the rights of others, which may imply either the right of property, or liberty, or both. As slavery is the highest degree of usurpation, and violence was the crying sin of that age, we have good reason to believe that it was one capital ingredient of that enormous guilt which brought upon them the greatest stroke of divine vengeance that ever befel the human race since the fall of Adam.

NIMROD.

The next intimation is in Gen. x. 8. "And Cush begat Nimrod : he began to be a mighty one in the earth. He was a mighty hunter before the Lord ; wherefore it is said, even as Nimrod the mighty hunter before the Lord : and the beginning of his kingdom was Babel," &c. Nimrod is not here literally termed a slaveholder ; but he is represented as a cruel tyrant, whose business was that of hunting and enslaving mankind, even as slave traders do the Africans.

ABRAHAM.

In the history of Abraham, we have accounts of servants, but no account of slaves. Gen. xiv. 14. "He armed his trained servants, born in his house, three hundred and eighteen." That these were not slaves, but only common servants, is evident from their being trained to the use of arms, which was quite inconsistent with the condition of slavery.

Secondly. The age of Abraham was so recent a period from the universal deluge, that mankind were not all organized into political governments ; so that patriarchal government was then necessary, which was no other than that of the great and wealthy presiding over, governing and defending such of the poorer class as were disposed to put themselves under their protection, to be their safeguard against lawless bands which might be disposed to live by plunder. That Abraham was one of those patriarchal rulers is evident from ch. xxiii. 6. "Hear us, my lord, thou art a mighty prince among us ; in the choice of thy sepulchres bury thy dead." This may be compared with the history of Job, as another example of patriarchal government, chapter xvii. Abraham was commanded to circumcise all born in his house, or bought with his money : but this command, instead of recognizing the lawfulness of slaveholding, is pointedly against it. It first supposes it lawful to purchase men for servants, which under peculiar circumstances is always lawful. 2d. Instead of riveting the chains of involuntary, unmerited, hereditary slavery upon them, they were to be circumcised, and thereby made members of the same church with their masters, and so made to have a right to the same privileges, both civil and ecclesiastical, which belonged to the Jews; one of which was exemption from a state of slavery; and this covenant obligation upon Abraham and his posterity to perpetual generations, absolutely precluded perpetual hereditary slavery from ever existing in the Jewish nations.

EGYPT.

The next account we have in scripture of servitude was that of Israel's bondage in Egypt, which was not complete slavery, neither was it to be compared to that which is practised in these United States, or in the West Indies. The Israelites were subject to cruel oppression in Egypt, but they had the privilege of residing on their own premises in the land of Goshen; and of domestic comfort with their own families, without being sold and scattered far away from each other. They also had their own individual property, as flocks and herds, and meat and drink in abundance, as appeared from their murmurings and expressions of regret for leaving the land of Egypt. Exodus xvi. 3. "And the children of Israel said unto them, would to God that we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the flesh pots, and where we had bread to the full." This was said on the fifteenth day of the second month, after they left Egypt, so that it was a matter fresh in their memories. Their bondage did not consist in being the private property of individuals throughout the nation, but in being subject to the arbitrary power of a tyrant, who had dominion over their bodies and lives at his pleasure; and although he did not hold them all at once in a state of actual servitude, yet he had carried on a constant practice of levying a tribute of laborers from among them, to be employed in mortar and brick, and in building store cities for Pharaoh, and were liable to be beaten and abused while employed in the service of the public. These, together with the murder of their male children for a time, were the principal ingredients of that bondage which Israel suffered in Egypt, which all taken together were less intolerable than that complete slavery which is now practised in the United States.

JEWISH.

The next account of servitude is in Leviticus xxv. 44-46. "Both thy bondmen and bondmaids which thou shalt have shall be of the heathen that are round about you, of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you which they begat in your land, and they shall be your possession. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bondmen forever." From this citation it is evident that servitude was admitted among the Jews, but it was materially different from modern slavery. As first—They were to be purchased from the heathens round about them, and neither stolen or taken by force. 2d—They were liable to be emancipated as soon as they complied with the ordinances of circumcision, and if they did not comply with that rite, their children must of necessity have been free at the ordinary time of native Jews, because all the Jews were bound to circumcise all that were born in their houses, or bought with their money, in consequence of which they became Jews, who could not be retained in bondage more than six years. 3d—If such as were purchased in an adult age, refused to comply with the ordinance of circumcision, they were only subject to servitude until the year of jubilee; but in that case their bondage did not entail the same to their posterity. That all servants among the Jews in every age were initiated into the Jewish church by circumcision, is as clearly revealed in the word of God, as any one truth it contains. Gen. xvii. 10. "This is my covenant which ye shall keep between me and you and thy seed after thee. Every man child among you shall be circumcised—verse 12; and he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you, every man child in your generations, he that is born in the house or bought with money of any stranger which is not of thy seed—verse 18. He that is born in the house or he that is bought with thy money must needs be circumcised, and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant.”

Secondly.—Circumcision entitled every subject of that ordinance to eat the passover, which supposes his initiation into the Jewish church and nation to be indisputable—Exodus, xii. 23. “And the Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, this is the ordinance of the passover; there shall no stranger eat thereof, but every man servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof; a foreigner and an hired servant shall not eat thereof.”

Thirdly.—No Hebrew could be in servitude longer than six years, Exodus, xxi. 2.—“If thou buy an Hebrew servant six years shall he serve, and in the seventh he shall go out free for nothing.” Compared with Deut. xv. 12. If then circumcision made every servant bought with money a Jew, and no Jew would be retained in servitude more than six years, the unavoidable consequence must be, that there could be no perpetual involuntary servants among the Jews. The whole argument runs thus: All Jews were bound to circumcise all born in their houses, or bought with money; circumcision made every one who was a subject of circumcision a Jew. No Jew could be a servant longer than six years, except he was so of choice. Therefore there could be no perpetual servants under the Jewish dispensation.

The expression, “ye shall take them for an inheritance for your children after you,” means that the same persons thus purchased of the heathen around them were not to be made free at the death of the purchaser, but were bound to serve their children. The last words, they shall be your bondmen forever, can only mean until the year of jubilee, which may be evinced from two reasons, although the phrase forever, and the word ever (in scripture) most certainly signifies an endless duration; yet it is sometimes used in a limited sense, as to the time of the Old Testament. Leviticus xviii. 15. To the year of jubilee, Deut. xv. 17, to man’s life time, 1st Samuel i. 22.

It signifies a long indefinite time, Joshua ii. 7. The sense of the word ever, or forever, may be known by the particular duration of that thing to which the expression is applied. Thus it signifies an endless duration, when it is used to express the duration of the saint's happiness in heaven, because the saints will eternally exist, and to express the duration of hell's torments, because the wicked will eternally exist. When it means only a temporary duration, it has a relation to some period which will necessarily have an end, and signifies that entire period. Thus it is sometimes used to express the duration of some blessing or privilege, properly restricted to the old testament dispensation, when it signifies the whole time of that dispensation, so a man's state of servitude was said to be forever, when it meant that it should continue until the year of jubilee, though it must of necessity have terminated with the period, in which case the temporary duration of that period determines the sense of the expression forever, shews it to be temporary and not eternal.

That the expression (bond servant forever) means only a temporary duration will further appear from God's aim in appointing the ordinance of jubilee, which was to give liberty to all that were in bondage. Lev. xxv. 10. "And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof, it shall be a jubilee unto you, and ye shall return every man unto his own family." Josephus, who had a better right to know the latitude to which the jubilee extended than any other ancient writer of which we have any knowledge, expressly says that it extended to slaves.—(See his Antiquities, page 73, quarto.)

Secondly. That the expression forever, was limited by the jubilee, is evident from the application of the phrase in other places. Lev. xxv. 39—40. "And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee, thou shalt not compel him to serve thee as a bond servant; but as an hired servant, as a sojourner; he shall be with thee and serve thee until the year of jubilee." But the person that is here said to serve until the year of jubilee is called a servant forever. Exodus xxi. 2. 7—Deut. xv. 12, 17. Objection. If no servant could be compelled to serve more than six years after being circumcised, what classes of servants were bound to serve until the year of jubilee? Ans. Such Jewish servants as refused freedom at the expiration of six years' service, and such of the heathen as refused to be received into the Jewish church by circumcision, and such as were convicted of crimes, which last is attested by Josephus.

THE GOLDEN RULE.

Among the Jews, agreeable to the nature and circumstances of servitude, as it has now been defined, the golden rule laid down by Jesus Christ, might have been applied in its fullest latitude by both masters and servants. "In all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them." This will appear from the peculiar circumstances of their condition. 1st. Servants bought of the heathen were most apt to be captives taken in war, or persons convicted of crimes; but none were kidnapped, because the man-thief and the receiver were both condemned to suffer death by the law of Moses. 2d. The heathen nations around the Jews were all civilized, and existed under organized governments, and could have no temptations to kidnap and sell their own people, except such as were legally convicted of crimes, or captives taken in war. 3d. Though servants from among the heathen were liable to be some captives, some convicts, others debtors, their condition was made better by becoming servants to the Jews, because they were admitted to all the privileges of the Jewish church as soon as they were prepared for it. 4th. If they did not comply with the rite of circumcision, yet their children were made free by circumcision, while they, viz. their parents, were to be made free at the jubilee. But that which rendered their servitude quite tolerable, was the law of God which regulated the government of servants. Ex. xxi. 26. "If a man smite the eye of his servant or the eye of his maid, that it perish, he shall let him go for his eye's sake. And if he smite out his man servant's tooth or his maid servant's tooth he shall let him go for his tooth's sake." The rule which obliged a master to liberate his servant for sake of an eye or a tooth, would do equally the same in any case of maiming or dismembering of the body, verse 20. "And if a man smite his servant or his maid with a rod, and he die under his hand he shall surely be punished." That this punishment was death is manifest from Lev. v. 22. "Notwithstanding if he continue a day or two he shall not be punished, for he is his money." Wilful murder was only punishable by death according to the divine law. Therefore if the servant corrected with the rod was to continue a day or two, it would shew that his master in correcting him had no design to kill him, more especially as the servant was his money, he could have no motive to take his life.

2dly. To prevent severe treatment, and secure a comfortable living to bond servants, the law of God absolutely prohibited all persons from taking up a servant merely for running away from his master. Deut. xxiii. 15. "Thou shalt not deliver unto his master the servant who is escaped from his master unto thee; he shall dwell with thee, even among you in that place which he shall choose—in one of thy gates where it liketh him best: thou shalt not oppress him."

3dly. All bond servants, hirelings and sojourners amongst the Jews, had all the profits arising from their lands every seventh year which would be very considerable, Lev. xxv. 1, 7, which taken in connection with all other circumstances of alleviation prevented their servitude from meriting the name of slavery.

From the view now taken of servitude amongst the Jews, it is evident that although they had bondmen and bond maids, there were no slaves allowed among them. And it may be added that the small degree of bondage which was authorized, was in virtue of a positive revelation of God's will, and was peculiar to the Jewish economy, and not morally binding on all nations; should any inquire why it was suited to the Old Testament, and not to the New, it may be answered there were necessary duties, to be performed by the members of that church, which could not be done without subjecting them to ceremonial uncleanness, and many laborious exercises about the altar and the temple services, which would have occupied too much of the time and attention of the true worshipers of Jehovah, without marring and interrupting their worship, which rendered servants from among the heathen necessary.

THE GIBEONITES.

This was completely exemplified in the case of the Gibeonites, who on account of the oath which the princes of the congregation had made to them, to preserve their lives, were spared, but on account of their gross deception and falsehood to obtain that oath, were condemned to a state of servitude—Joshua ix. 22. And Joshua called for them, and he spake unto them saying, wherefore have ye beguiled us, saying we are very far from you, when you dwelt among us. Now therefore ye are cursed, and there shall none of you be freed from being bondmen, and hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of my God, verse 27. “ And Joshua made them that day hewers of wood and drawers of water for the congregation, and for the altar of the Lord, even unto this day in the place which the Lord should choose.”

The Gibeonites were condemned to be hewers of wood and drawers of water to the congregation and to the altar of the Lord; that is to the nation in their public assemblies; and to serve at the altar and the temple in preparing wood and water, and in such services as were subservient to the public ordinances of the Lord, about which his people were to be engaged; all which supposed them to be the public property of the nation, but not the private property of any individuals, and were only liable to be called out to the service of public assemblies, and to the service of the sanctuary when their service was required, which must have been done by levying a tribute of as many persons as might be useful at such times. The same persons might be allowed to retire to their own homes, and others called forth to succeed them in their turn, while we have a good reason to believe they were allowed a due compensation for their labors.

That the Gibeonites were public servants to the nation, and not private slaves to individuals, is evident from the form of expression used by Joshua in passing the sentence upon them, and also from their actual condition in after times, particularly in the days of Saul. Saul thought to slay them in his zeal for the children of Israel. 2 Sam. xxi. 2-5. "He consumed them and devised against them, that he might destroy them from remaining in any of the coasts of Israel." From which it is manifest that they could not be the private property of individuals dispersed throughout the nation. Had they been private property, Saul could not have shewn his zeal for the children of Israel by destroying them. It is further evident from their serving in the armies of Israel, which is an employment ill adapted to the condition of slaves ; also from their return with the Jews from their captivity in Babylon, which could hardly have been expected had they been slaves.

From the history of servitude now given, and from the nature and different forms of it as recorded in scriptures, it appears that there never was such a thing as slavery amongst the Jews before the Babylonish captivity, and it would be a difficult task to prove that it ever had a being in its present form in any nation, from the deluge to the times of the Greeks and Romans, who both were in the habit of enslaving their captives taken in war. It is certain that the king of Assyria did not make slaves of the ten tribes of Israel ; but placed them in different parts of his empire, to live by their industry, allowed to be incorporated with his own subjects. It is also evident from the scriptures that the king of Babylon did not make slaves of the Jews, but gave them the privilege of building houses, and planting vineyards, and living by their own industry, and made a selection of the most learned and active to take part in the government of the empire.

Having now given a history of servitude from the scriptures, down to the time of the Jews' captivity in Babylon, in order to come at the main subject intended by this treatise, we shall not detain the reader with a further detail of the history of slavery, but refer him to Clarkson's Essays on Slavery, which contain a brief account of slavery among the Greeks and Romans, with a correct history of African slavery.

CHAPTER III.

SLAVEHOLDING A HEINOUS SIN.

III. We are now to prove that slavery, according to the common acceptance of the term, is a heinous sin, condemned by the word of God, and repugnant to the law of nature.

THE MORAL LAW.

The first argument may be taken from the nature of the moral law, and its universal obligation upon mankind.

In our introduction it has been shewn that the moral law is a transcript of the divine character. That it is called the law of nature, because it is discoverable in the book of nature, which exhibits to the view of mankind the various relations in which they stand to God and to one another, and as a law binds them to act agreeable to these relations, and we may now add, that the word of God is only the same law more perfectly revealed, together with a display of the economy of redemption. The moral law as a written revelation, and the law of nature as it is revealed in the book of nature, being the same as to moral obligation, it is impossible that the one can contradict or oppose the other.

To apply these principles to the business of slaveholding, it may be safely admitted, that if the practice has nothing to justify it but the civil law, while it stands opposed to the moral law, it must be criminal. Slaveholding cannot be defended in virtue of an inherent power possessed by man, antecedent to the existence of civil government, because in that state of society mankind are all equally entitled to enjoy freedom, and are all in duty bound to defend their own personal rights, and the natural rights of others, as far as is competent to them in that capacity: therefore, mankind in that unorganized condition which necessarily precedes all organized states, can have no right to enslave one another, but on the contrary are bound to protect each other against any attempts which might be made to deprive them of either life, liberty, or property, and are bound by the moral law to adopt the best method which may give strength and energy to their lawful efforts to secure their natural rights ; but the wisest and best method which has yet been found to secure the natural rights of man, is for all the members of a community to concentrate by delegations their legal right of defending their private privileges into the hands of representatives, that by their agency they may better perform those duties to themselves and others which they were bound in a private capacity to have done, as far as was competent to them.

If the members of a community can and do transfer from themselves to representatives their right to freedom, that is, their natural rights to serve God according to the relations in which they stand to him, and their right to perform all relative duties to one another, slavery may be justified, if not, it must be condemned. But none are disposed to plead for a transfer of their personal freedom ; therefore it is retained still in the hands of the people. The point is perfectly obvious, for if the members of a community have no right in an unorganized state to deprive one another of life, liberty or property, they cannot transfer a right to others which they never possessed themselves. If, then, no such right was or ever could be transferred from the people to their representatives, the representatives themselves can have no moral right to deprive any of the community of life, liberty, or property, except they forfeit their right by crimes, for civil rulers cannot exercise a power which they never either had or could have. But it is self-evident, that if a people or nation can have no right to enslave one another within the limits of their own jurisdiction or territories, they can have still less without their own boundaries, or in other parts of the world, because neither political divisions of lands, nor natural divisions by rivers, chains of mountains or seas, can make void the moral law. Therefore, wherever a people delegate a power to representatives to enslave any of the human race, it cannot be a moral power, but it is mere physical power, which is the power of force, and when physical force, stript of moral obligation, is exercised to deprive mankind of their natural rights to freedom, it is only another name for the most cruel tyranny ; so that slaveholding is contrary to the law of nature, is downright tyranny, and an usurpation of power over the rights of man.

MORAL LAW CONTRADICTORY.

Secondly—Every practice must be sinful which tends to set the moral law at war with itself ; but slaveholding is of that nature. Therefore,

If slaveholding is just, it must be the master's duty to retain the slave in his service, and to prevent him from deserting it. But it is the slave's duty to desert his service if he can have a fair opportunity to escape ; yea, most of slaveholders will acknowledge that were they in the slave's place, they would try to escape from their servitude ; which represents the moral law to be at war with itself ; first making it to be the master's duty to retain the slave in servitude, and at the same instant making it the slave's duty to desert his service ; in that case moral right would be contending with moral right.

If slaveholding is lawful in the sight of God, it must be the indispensable duty of the slaves' master to pray to God that the slaves and their posterity may be kept in bondage forever. But the moral law makes it the indispensable duty of slaves to pray to God that they and their posterity may be delivered from bondage, agreeable to Paul's direction, be ye not servants of men. But when two prayers contradict one another, one of them must be wrong, because the moral law cannot contradict itself in its obligations upon men, neither does the gospel contain contradictory promises adapted to contradictory prayers.

GOD'S GREAT END.

Thirdly—Every practice must be wrong that is at variance with God's great end in making man, which was that he should glorify God and enjoy him forever ; but slaveholding is of that description.

For men to be in a state of slavery is to be under the complete dominion of their masters, so as not to be at liberty to dispose of their time for the service of God or the enjoyment of him, but are liable to be prevented from reading, meditation and prayer. God commands all men to "seek first the kingdom of God and his righteousness," and has promised that all other things shall be added. But the slave is bound first to submit to his master's authority, come what will of the command of God, or the moral end of his creation.

The slaveholder's power over the slave is an authority which he possesses over the private relative duties of the slave, without being controlled by the laws of government. It is the usurpation of that power in which the sin of slaveholding consists. The cruel administration of that power, is only an aggravation of the crime; but the grand radical point in which the most deadly criminality lies, is the usurped office or station which he occupies. Thus the grand reason why a tyrant's throat ought to be cut, is not so much because his administration is cruel, but because he has usurpt that office or station which admits of neither bounds nor restraints to his cruelty; and such is the station of a slaveholder, that without control he can prevent the slave from answering the great end of his creation, which was to glorify God and enjoy him forever.

REQUIRES SIN TO SUSTAIN IT.

Fourthly—That practice must be criminal which of necessity requires sin to support it; but slaveholding is of that nature. Therefore it is itself sinful.

The practice of slaveholding can have no permanent existence in state, kingdom, or commonwealth, without restraining the slaves from learning; for if slaves should once be universally taught to read, write, and allowed to make proficiency in other branches of literature, it would be impossible to retain them in bondage, for they would then be able to plead their own cause against their anti-christian masters, and keep their consciences in perpetual torment; so also liable by reading, and the use of maps, to understand the geography of the country where they reside, so as to know the most eligible route to take in attempting to escape. But to prevent by force any of mankind from the improvement of their intellectual faculties, is to invert the order of nature, is a contradiction of God's great end in giving mankind those faculties, by reducing them down to the level of brute creatures, which is a crime so directly at war with the very light of nature and conscience, that it appears almost an insult to the human understanding to attempt its further demonstration.

OBSTRUCTS THE MEANS OF GRACE.

Fifthly—Every practice must be criminal that necessarily obstructs the means of grace, and tends to prevent the salvation of sinners. But slaveholding is of that nature.

To restrain the slaves from learning, has been shewn to be a necessary appendage of slavery. But to learn to read the word of God is an important means of knowing the will of God, revealed to mankind for their salvation; therefore to restrain any of the human race from the knowledge of God's written word, is in the first instance a high insult upon the God of heaven whose end in giving mankind a written revelation, was that they should read it, and thereby acquire a knowledge of his method of salvation, and escape from the wrath to come, and be made faithful subjects of his kingdom and government. Suppose some great earthly potentate was to promulgate a code of laws for the good government of his subjects, accompanied with a positive injunction upon all people under his dominion to read it and live conformable to it as rules of civil duty. If a certain class of his subjects were to exert their utmost influence to hinder as many of the community as they could have under their power from reading it, merely to answer their own worldly interest, they could not be reputed better than traitors to his government. How much more criminal then must be the conduct of those who restrain the subjects of the great potentate of heaven and earth, who is king of kings and lord of lords from reading that revelation of his will which he has given to his subjects, to teach them to glorify and enjoy him forever.

Again, to prevent any of mankind from reading the word of God, is to do that which tends to prevent their salvation, because it prevents the means leading to the end. It prevents them from the knowledge of God's written law, his gospel doctrines and promises, and from the hope of eternal life, and implies a sacrificing the sin-

The power of freedom may be taken away by force from parents and their children forever, but the right of freedom cannot be taken away from either parents or children. Should slaveholders insist that the right of freedom can be taken away without any criminal forfeiture, it may be asked by what law can it be taken away? It cannot be taken away by the moral law, which forbids stealing, and says—In all things whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, do ye also to them. It cannot be by the authority of the civil law, for the civil law has no power to interfere with men's private rights to either tolerate the enjoyment of them or take them away. The people, the constituents of civil government, never transferred or could transfer to their representatives a power over the private rights of men; and certain it is that civil rulers can never give a legal power to others which they do not possess themselves.

Therefore the right of freedom cannot be taken away, except in the case of a criminal forfeiture. And if it cannot be taken away by any lawful authority, it supposes that in the case of African slavery, the power of freedom is all that is taken away. The African slaves have a right to be free, but the power of enjoying it, is by violence withheld from them, which supposes slaveholding to be downright theft and robbery. It is theft, as it is a most flagrant instance of fraud and robbery, as it is a direct instance of violence without the shadow of justice; but it is an aggravation of the sin of robbery, far beyond any kind or degree of this species of crime which can come under our observation. As, 1st. If it is a crime deserving of corporeal punishment to steal part of a man's property, it must be a crime still greater to steal it all. 2d. The crime in the first instance must be the same in degree to take away by fraud and violence all a man's property, or to take a man from all his property, the loss is the same to the owner; but slaveholding takes a man from all his property, and absolutely prevents him from possessing more until the day of his death. Common robbery is apt to be a mere transient act, but this is perpetual while the sufferer lives. Other cases of robbery or theft only deprive a man of his outward substance, but slaveholding robs the person of a man soul and body.

influenced by fear, in many instances, would justly deter them from being witnesses in behalf of their masters. 3. Their gross ignorance of the nature of an oath, and of the consequences of a false testimony, prevents them from being capable of bearing witness for or against any person, so that slaves are so far from enjoying the rights of citizens, or even foreigners, that they are completely outlawed. See laws of Kentucky, volume 2, from page 113 to 128, in the appendix.

AGAINST RELATIVE DUTIES.

Seventhly—That practice must be wicked which tends to make void all those moral obligations to relative duties which God by his providence and the authority of his word has made binding. But slaveholding is of that description.

The business of slaveholding deprives the slaves of their natural rights, which cannot be touched at, or affected by, any legitimate civil authority to either grant or withhold, as the right of duty in husbands to wives, and the right of duty in wives to husbands; the right of parental authority over children, and the right of duty in children to their parents.

The question is not whether all masters do in every instance deprive their slaves of all these natural rights; but whether they have a power according to the laws and regulations of slave states, to restrain them of these natural rights and privileges. That slave masters have all this power will not be called in question by any that are acquainted with the rules of slavery. If slaves retain these rights, so as the master has no jurisdiction over them, they are not slaves. For example: If the father has an authority over his children, without the control of his master, to teach his children to read, it supposes he is not a slave in that respect, but is his own master. If the parents have authority to demand obedience from the children to their commands, in preference to the will of their masters, they are no slaves. If the children have a right and power to obey the commands of their parents, as superior to any other human authority, it supposes they are no slaves; but all these relative obligations to duty, are reversed in the case of slavery. Therefore slave.

holding is of so heaven-daring a nature as to claim the power of dissolving the moral obligations of parents to their children, and those of children to their parents.

That slaveholding destroys the moral obligations which arise from the conjugal relation, is manifest, because the business in its very nature supposes that any man has a right to purchase a slave whether married or single, and to remove him or her to any distance he may think fit; and the holder of slaves may sell them, whether married or single. If the slave is married he may sell him to a merchant, who may remove him to such a distance as he may never see his partner more, which is done in thousands of instances. Thus slaveholding puts asunder those whom God has joined together, in direct contradiction to the express command of God. Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

The business of slaveholding implies an unrestrained power to divide families which God's ordinance has joined together, and also united by the ties of natural affection and sympathy, so as never to see one another more, or to have it in their power to perform the relative duties which they, by the ties of nature and the law of God, owe one to another.

From the evils now shewn forth as essentially connected with slavery, it may be proved that slaveholding is a breach of all the ten commandments.

THE FIRST COMMANDMENT.

Eighthly—Slaveholding is an express violation of the first commandment.

The man who holds a slave as his own property, assumes the place of God, because his authority comes in prior to the obligations of his law, so that he can restrain the slaves from all those duties, which the law of God requires of him, with which the civil law in no respect interferes, such as the times of worshipping God, the duty of taking times and using means to read his word, in order that he may be fit to discharge his duty to God.

The first commandment requires us to know and acknowledge God to be the only true God, and to worship and glorify him accordingly. But slaveholding of necessity prevents the slaves from the means of knowing God as the living and true God, and from the most perfect way of worshiping him. It is no solid objection to this argument, that some individuals do not altogether restrain their slaves from the means of knowledge; for certain it is, that the business of involuntary, unmerited, hereditary slavery of necessity requires the means of knowledge to be withheld from the slaves; and it is a well known fact that the slaves in the United States of America and in the West Indies, are, with a very few exceptions, held in most brutish ignorance. Therefore, slaveholding is a most open and daring violation of the first commandment. The slaveholder first usurps the place of God, and claims the first reverence.

He prevents the slave as far as in his power from knowing the true God, and from worshiping and glorifying him accordingly. His usurping the place of God, his injustice and cruelty, in preventing the slaves from knowing the will of God, by reading his word, and from receiving correct ideas of the way of salvation through Jesus Christ, are not only the highest affront to the majesty of God, but they prove the greatest stumbling block in the way of the slaves to prevent their salvation. Their gross ignorance renders them incapable of distinguishing that real Christianity which flows from God through Jesus Christ, which produces love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, temperance, meekness, and that which they experience in their tyrannical masters; and thence are liable to conclude that the Christian's God must be a tyrant, and that the whole scheme of Christianity can be nothing but a system of error and cruelty. And we have good reason to believe that this very stumbling block is the cause why so few are disposed to attend public worship, even where they are not prevented by the authority of masters.

THE SECOND COMMANDMENT.

Ninthly—That practice must be criminal which necessarily requires the breach of the second commandment. But slaveholding is of that description.

The second commandment forbids the worshiping of God by images or idols, or any other way not appointed in his word. But the slaveholder makes himself an idol to the slave, by contravening the authority of God's law relative to the slave; so that he has no power to worship God in the practical use of his word and ordinances, nor power to command his own children or household, but through the permission of his master. If the slave worships God at all, or teaches his family, it must be by the sovereign will of his master, who is his idol.

A master who voluntarily assumes that power which contravenes the authority of God's law relative to the slave, treats God as an idol, and not the true God; for it is impossible that the true God could grant any such privilege to a creature.

The second commandment requires the receiving, observing, keeping pure and entire all such religious worship and ordinances as God hath appointed in his word. But the slaveholder excludes the slave from the means of knowing the true God and his ordinances, and prevents the possibility of his keeping pure and entire such religious worship and ordinances, as he has appointed in his word, by monopolizing all the slave's time to himself, without allowing him either leisure or means to know the will of God, or to render that worship and reverence to him which his word requires. Therefore slaveholding is a most flagrant breach of the second commandment.

Slaveholding is a most formal example of sacrificing to an idol, or false god. The idol is Dives, the god of riches. The sacrifice is, the temporal and eternal happiness of the slaves. The ancient heathens offered human sacrifices to their gods, but it did not affect the eternal happiness of the victims; but the slaveholder sacrifices both the temporal and eternal happiness of the slaves, therefore his crime is as much worse than the practice of the heathen, as an eternal happiness is more valuable than a temporal.

The method by which slaveholders sacrifice the eternal happiness of the slaves, is keeping them in a state of brutish ignorance, so as to be incapable of attaining to salvation in the ordinary way. God may, and, in many instances, does save sinners without reading, yet the tendency of slaveholding is to prevent their salvation.

charity which esteems another's good as well as our own, is contrary to that second great commandment—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." Slaveholding is a sacrificing another's interest to our own, and is a violation of the tenth commandment of the highest aggravation. Other acts of this sin may be of a partial nature, and may respect some things only; but this is a degree of covetousness which, as a sweeping rain, takes all. Person, liberty, property and privileges, both spiritual and temporal; we use the word property for labor, because the poor man's labor is his property as much as houses, lands, and goods, are the property of a rich man. Houses, lands, and goods, are of value to a man, not because of the materials which constitute these articles, but because of the profits which he derives from their use. So the poor man's labor is of use to him, not so much on account of the labor itself, as from the profits arising from it; so that for one man to deprive another of liberty, and by force exact his labor without a due compensation, is the highest degree of covetousness, the grossest kind of theft and robbery; and a real slaveholder ought to be viewed with the same abhorrence, and treated with the same contempt as the most atrocious thief, robber, or buccanier, that ever infested sea or land, or disgraced human nature.

THE RIGHT OF ALL MEN TO THE WORLD.

Eighteenth—The criminality of slaveholding may be proved from a prior right which all the sons and daughters of Adam have to enjoy this world and the goodness of providence, which right arises from that original grant which God gave to man in his creation of this world. Genesis i. 28: "And God blessed them and said unto them, Be fruitful, and multiply and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth. And God said, Behold, I have given every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree in which is the fruit of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat."

This appears to be the grand charter upon which the right of all property is founded. And if this grant or

The ignorance in which slaves are held, in order to secure their permanent subjection, is an occasion of most atrocious profanity in the lives and conversations of slaves ; one ingredient of which is, that of taking the name of God in vain by profane swearing and cursing. 2. The necessity of keeping the slaves in a state of brutish ignorance, renders it impossible for them to either know the true name of God or his attributes, in order to worship him agreeable to his word, neither are they competent to make oath before any court.

The practice of slaveholding is a breach of the sacramental covenant, which is implied in baptism and the Lord's supper ; in both of which persons are bound, with all the solemnity of an oath, to love their neighbors as themselves, and to do to all others whatsoever they would that they should do to them.

THE FOURTH COMMANDMENT.

Eleventh—That practice must be criminal which occasions the breach of the fourth commandment, which is, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." But slaveholding is of that nature.

The slave is amenable to no law but that of his master's will. If he chooses to obey the law of God for conscience' sake, rather than his master's will, he must be exposed to most cruel persecution, so that the slave is liable to be compelled to break the Sabbath. If he should refuse, he could have no redress from the laws of the commonwealth, for a slave can have no protection from the laws of slave states ; such is the nature of slaveholding, that it excludes the slaves from the protection of the civil law, and places them entirely at the disposal of their masters, who have a despotical authority over the persons and the behavior of their slaves, both of a spiritual and temporal nature. Though the civil law will not grant positive protection to a master in compelling his slaves to labor on the Sabbath, yet, as no cause can be supported before a court but by legal testimony, to which a slave is not competent, the master has an absolute power to compel the slave to labor on the Sabbath, or to violate any other precept of the moral law.

The fourth commandment binds all heads of families to command all within their gates to keep the Sabbath; but facts bear witness that slaves, almost every Sabbath, are kept to labor, the females in kitchens, and the males about the stables or other domestic labor. But when even works of necessity are all thrown over upon the slaves, it will for the most part employ them through the day; but should works of necessity admit of some relaxation to the slaves, the constant round of visiting practised among slaveholders on the Sabbath will keep the slaves employed from morning to evening in serving them. Besides all this, many slaveholders compel their slaves to labor in the field on the Sabbath; others, by withholding a scanty allowance of victualling, compel them to labor on the Sabbath for their support.

The profound ignorance in which the slaves are held, of necessity occasions the breach of the Sabbath-day, because the Sabbath cannot be kept holy to the Lord in any acceptable form, but by holiness in heart, life, and conversation; and none that are ignorant of God's word, of his doctrines, his promises, or of the economy of grace and salvation, can keep the Sabbath holy to the Lord; so that the breach of the Sabbath is a necessary consequence of slaveholding.

THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT.

Twelfth—That practice must be criminal which occasions the breach of the fifth commandment, which is, "Honor thy father and thy mother." But slaveholding is of that description.

The fifth commandment requires the duty of parents to children, and the duties of children to their parents. The chief of all parental duties is that of teaching children the knowledge of God's word, the doctrines of religion, and the way of salvation through Jesus Christ: Prov. xxii. 6. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it:" Deut. vi. 4. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart; and thou shalt teach them diligently unto thy children, and thou shalt talk of them when thou sittest in thine house, and when thou walkest by the way, and when thou liest down, and when thou risest up. And thou shalt bind them for a sign upon thine hand, and they shall be as frontlets between thine eyes. And thou shalt write them upon the posts of thy house, and on thy gates." But cruel slaveholding prevents family instruction. It necessarily prevents both parents and children from either knowing or fulfilling their reciprocal obligations to each other, by keeping them in a state of intellectual and moral darkness : and besides this, slaveholders, by cruel tyranny, prevent parents doing their duty to their children, agreeable to the fifth commandment, and children from obeying their parents. This they do by usurping the headship and rightful authority of the parents over their children, and the right of obedience in the children to the parents ; and thus make their own authority to be above that of the moral law, as it relates to the duties of parents to children, and those of children to their parents ; in all which it outreaches the utmost stretch of civil power, which claims no authority over the private rights and private duties of the citizens ; so that a slaveholder is a tyrant, a cruel despot, in the most aggravated sense in which it can be understood. The grand point of difference between a government founded on equity, and one that is despotic, lies in one thing. The former is a power delegated to civil rulers from the people, which cannot interfere with the private rights or private relative duties of the people, which are incapable of being transferred to representatives ; but the latter, without the consent of the people, usurps a power over the community to command them at his pleasure, but rarely, in the administration of his power, meddles with the private rights and private duties of the citizens. The slaveholder ranks on a level with the worst of tyrants upon the globe, as to his usurpation of power ; but, in his administration of that power, he far exceeds the most cruel tyrant upon earth : so that slaveholding is so flagrant a breach of the fifth commandment, that the most superficial observer may be led to conviction who will apply his mind to the subject.

THE SIXTH COMMANDMENT.

Thirteenth—That practice must be criminal which implies a breach of the sixth commandment. But slaveholding is of that description.

1st. Slavery is founded on violence, both in its origin and continuance, to which if the slave would not submit, he would be liable to suffer death—that is to be beaten and abused, to compel him to submit to the cruel yoke, which, should he still refuse to comply with, would at length issue in his death; for with slaveholders there is no medium between punishment and death, but submission. Should the slave persist in refusing submission, he could expect nothing but death. Therefore, slaveholding is founded upon and exists by murder; and murder is essential to its existence. No one will deny that a robber on the highway is a murderer in the sight of God, who obtains his booty on condition of saving life.

2d. Should the slaves attempt to emancipate themselves by force, which every candid mind will grant would be morally right, according to the laws of slave states, death would be their portion; so that murder is the foundation and support of slavery. But murder is not only theoretically interwoven with slavery; but it is practically exemplified; so that there are few settlements, where slavery is practised, in which there is not a number of instances of slaves suffering death, that, in God's account, will be reputed murder, which are caused by either cruel beating, want of clothing, hunger, or hard labor. Besides, there have been numerous examples of their suffering death for making insurrections; or for attempting that which would be accounted heroic virtue in their judges themselves, were they in the same condition, in Algiers, Tunis, or Tripoli.

3d. The crime of slaveholding may, by a very short process of reasoning, be shown to be much more aggravating than a common act of murder, as

The sin of murder, in ordinary cases, is not restricted to the mere act of depriving the person of life, but it is depriving the innocent person of the enjoyments of life, and of an opportunity of improving the mind in such branches of religious and scientific knowledge, as ner's salvation to the slaveholder's worldly gains, or a violent attempt to shut up the way to eternal life, to prevent their entering, and depriving the slaves of all that consolation which is apt to be enjoyed in reading the word of God, together with that spiritual profit and advantage which Christians are apt to experience in hearing the gospel preached, so that slaveholders are neither entering the kingdom of heaven themselves, nor will they suffer others to enter in.

AGAINST NATURAL RIGHTS.

Sixthly—That practice must be unlawful which deprives any part of the community, of the natural rights of citizens; but slaveholding is of that description.

All men have a natural right to be citizens, and to enjoy civil protection in that nation or government where they have a permanent residence, except some legal cause should prevent it, in which case such as may be exempted, have a right of removal to some other part of the world; but in the case of slavery the slaves are deprived of both the rights of citizens, and a removal to any other part of the world, without any just reason for their prevention.

All men, both citizens and foreigners, have a right to the protection of law in that nation where, in the course of providence their lot is cast, but the slaves have not the protection of law in slave states, but are placed under the arbitrary power of their masters, and have no more protection from the laws than horses or cattle, except so far as will serve the worldly interest of slaveholders. Hence it is, that in some slave states killing a slave is not in law murder of the first degree, whereas stealing one is a capital crime. These unjust measures of necessity belong to the business of slaveholding, because no man can be admitted to the protection of the civil law, without being admitted to his oath or affirmation, but slaves cannot be admitted to make oath for or against any person before a court of justice without most dangerous consequences. As, 1st. They cannot be admitted to accuse their masters, as they might readily be suspected of prejudice and false accusation, for there is apt to subsist a deep rooted enmity in slaves against their masters. 2. The danger of being influenced by fear, in many instances, would justly deter them from being witnesses in behalf of their masters.

3. Their gross ignorance of the nature of an oath, and of the consequences of a false testimony, prevents them from being capable of bearing witness for or against any person, so that slaves are so far from enjoying the rights of citizens, or even foreigners, that they are completely outlawed. See laws of Kentucky, volume 2, from page 113 to 128, in the appendix.

AGAINST RELATIVE DUTIES.

Seventhly—That practice must be wicked which tends to make void all those moral obligations to relative duties which God by his providence and the authority of his word has made binding. But slaveholding is of that description.

The business of slaveholding deprives the slaves of their natural rights, which cannot be touched at, or affected by, any legitimate civil authority to either grant or withhold, as the right of duty in husbands to wives, and the right of duty in wives to husbands; the right of parental authority over children, and the right of duty in children to their parents.

The question is not whether all masters do in every instance deprive their slaves of all these natural rights; but whether they have a power according to the laws and regulations of slave states, to restrain them of these natural rights and privileges. That slave masters have all this power will not be called in question by any that are acquainted with the rules of slavery. If slaves retain these rights, so as the master has no jurisdiction over them, they are not slaves. For example: If the father has an authority over his children, without the control of his master, to teach his children to read, it supposes he is not a slave in that respect, but is his own master. If the parents have authority to demand obedience from the children to their commands, in preference to the will of their masters, they are no slaves. If the children have a right and power to obey the commands of their parents, as superior to any other human authority, it supposes they are no slaves; but all these relative obligations to duty, are reversed in the case of slavery. Therefore slaveholding is of so heaven-daring a nature as to claim the power of dissolving the moral obligations of parents to their children, and those of children to their parents.

That slaveholding destroys the moral obligations which arise from the conjugal relation, is manifest, because the business in its very nature supposes that any man has a right to purchase a slave whether married or single, and to remove him or her to any distance he may think fit ; and the holder of slaves may sell them, whether married or single. If the slave is married he may sell him to a merchant, who may remove him to such a distance as he may never see his partner more, which is done in thousands of instances. Thus slaveholding puts asunder those whom God has joined together, in direct contradiction to the express command of God. Whom God hath joined together, let no man put asunder.

The business of slaveholding implies an unrestrained power to divide families which God's ordinance has joined together, and also united by the ties of natural affection and sympathy, so as never to see one another more, or to have it in their power to perform the relative duties which they, by the ties of nature and the law of God, owe one to another.

From the evils now shewn forth as essentially connected with slavery, it may be proved that slaveholding is a breach of all the ten commandments.

THE FIRST COMMANDMENT.

Eighthly—Slaveholding is an express violation of the first commandment.

The man who holds a slave as his own property, assumes the place of God, because his authority comes in prior to the obligations of his law, so that he can restrain the slaves from all those duties, which the law of God requires of him, with which the civil law in no respect interferes, such as the times of worshipping God, the duty of taking times and using means to read his word, in order that he may be fit to discharge his duty to God.

The first commandment requires us to know and acknowledge God to be the only true God, and to worship and glorify him accordingly. But slaveholding of necessity prevents the slaves from the means of knowing God as the living and true God, and from the most perfect way of worshipping him. It is no solid objection to this argument, that some individuals do not altogether restrain their slaves from the means of knowledge; for certain it is, that the business of involuntary, unmerited, hereditary slavery of necessity requires the means of knowledge to be withheld from the slaves; and it is a well known fact that the slaves in the United States of America and in the West Indies, are, with a very few exceptions, held in most brutish ignorance. Therefore, slaveholding is a most open and daring violation of the first commandment. The slaveholder first usurps the place of God, and claims the first reverence.

He prevents the slave as far as in his power from knowing the true God, and from worshipping and glorifying him accordingly. His usurping the place of God, his injustice and cruelty, in preventing the slaves from knowing the will of God, by reading his word, and from receiving correct ideas of the way of salvation through Jesus Christ, are not only the highest affront to the majesty of God, but they prove the greatest stumbling block in the way of the slaves to prevent their salvation. Their gross ignorance renders them incapable of distinguishing that real Christianity which flows from God through Jesus Christ, which produces love, joy, peace, long suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, temperance, meekness, and that which they experience in their tyrannical masters; and thence are liable to conclude that the Christian's God must be a tyrant, and that the whole scheme of Christianity can be nothing but a system of error and cruelty. And we have good reason to believe that this very stumbling block is the cause why so few are disposed to attend public worship, even where they are not prevented by the authority of masters.

THE SECOND COMMANDMENT.

The second commandment forbids the worshipping of God by images or idols, or any other way not appointed in his word. But the slaveholder makes himself an idol to the slave, by contravening the authority of God's law relative to the slave; so that he has no power to worship God in the practical use of his word and ordinances, nor power to command his own children or household, but through the permission of his master. If the slave worships God at all, or teaches his family, it must be by the sovereign will of his master, who is his idol.

A master who voluntarily assumes that power which contravenes the authority of God's law relative to the slave, treats God as an idol, and not the true God; for it is impossible that the true God could grant any such privilege to a creature.

The second commandment requires the receiving, observing, keeping pure and entire all such religious worship and ordinances as God hath appointed in his word. But the slaveholder excludes the slave from the means of knowing the true God and his ordinances, and prevents the possibility of his keeping pure and entire such religious worship and ordinances, as he has appointed in his word, by monopolizing all the slave's time to himself, without allowing him either leisure or means to know the will of God, or to render that worship and reverence to him which his word requires. Therefore slaveholding is a most flagrant breach of the second commandment.

Slaveholding is a most formal example of sacrificing to an idol, or false god. The idol is Dives, the god of riches. The sacrifice is, the temporal and eternal happiness of the slaves. The ancient heathens offered human sacrifices to their gods, but it did not affect the eternal happiness of the victims; but the slaveholder sacrifices both the temporal and eternal happiness of the slaves, therefore his crime is as much worse than the practice of the heathen, as an eternal happiness is more valuable than a temporal.

The method by which slaveholders sacrifice the eternal happiness of the slaves, is keeping them in a state of brutish ignorance, so as to be incapable of attaining to salvation in the ordinary way. God may, and, in many instances, does save sinners without reading, yet the tendency of slaveholding is to prevent their salvation.

It cannot be a valid objection to this reasoning, that a preventing the slaves from every branch of literature, and therewith family instruction, is only an abuse of slavery, because it is and has been shown to be essential to its permanent existence. A thing may be said to be abused when it is perverted to an end entirely contrary to its native tendency; but for slaveholders to educate their slaves is an abuse of slavery, because it tends to bring about their emancipation, and put a final end to the practice; but to keep the slaves in complete ignorance, is the surest method to keep them in bondage.

Suppose the legislature of a slave state was to compel all the holders of slaves to have all their slaves taught to read and write, and oblige them to feed and clothe them well, it would not only prepare the slaves to emancipate themselves, but it would eventually compel the slaveholders to do it themselves. Considering the slow reluctance with which the slaves labor, together with the expenses of education, victualling, and clothing, agreeable to such a law, it would cause the expenses to be more than the profits arising from their labor, and occasion a general emancipation; for slaveholders can have no profits except that which arises from extortion, or the privations of education, victualling, and clothing.

THE THIRD COMMANDMENT.

Tenthly—That practice must be criminal which causes the breach of the third commandment. But slaveholding is of that description.

The third commandment is, "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain, for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain."

This commandment implies a negative and a positive. The negative forbids the abuse and unnecessary use of the name of God; or withholding that honor and glory which his creatures owe to him. The positive lays an obligation upon all to use the name of God in a right, solemn, and seasonable manner; as in religious worship, religious conversation, and in making oath before a court of justice. But slaveholding causes the breach of the third commandment both negatively and positively. As, 1st.

The ignorance in which slaves are held, in order to secure their permanent subjection, is an occasion of most atrocious profanity in the lives and conversations of slaves ; one ingredient of which is, that of taking the name of God in vain by profane swearing and cursing. 2. The necessity of keeping the slaves in a state of brutish ignorance, renders it impossible for them to either know the true name of God or his attributes, in order to worship him agreeable to his word, neither are they competent to make oath before any court.

The practice of slaveholding is a breach of the sacramental covenant, which is implied in baptism and the Lord's supper ; in both of which persons are bound, with all the solemnity of an oath, to love their neighbors as themselves, and to do to all others whatsoever they would that they should do to them.

THE FOURTH COMMANDMENT.

Eleventh—That practice must be criminal which occasions the breach of the fourth commandment, which is, "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." But slaveholding is of that nature.

The slave is amenable to no law but that of his master's will. If he chooses to obey the law of God for conscience' sake, rather than his master's will, he must be exposed to most cruel persecution, so that the slave is liable to be compelled to break the Sabbath. If he should refuse, he could have no redress from the laws of the commonwealth, for a slave can have no protection from the laws of slave states ; such is the nature of slaveholding, that it excludes the slaves from the protection of the civil law, and places them entirely at the disposal of their masters, who have a despotical authority over the persons and the behavior of their slaves, both of a spiritual and temporal nature. Though the civil law will not grant positive protection to a master in compelling his slaves to labor on the Sabbath, yet, as no cause can be supported before a court but by legal testimony, to which a slave is not competent, the master has an absolute power to compel the slave to labor on the Sabbath, or to violate any other precept of the moral law.

The fourth commandment binds all heads of families to command all within their gates to keep the Sabbath; but facts bear witness that slaves, almost every Sabbath, are kept to labor, the females in kitchens, and the males about the stables or other domestic labor. But when even works of necessity are all thrown over upon the slaves, it will for the most part employ them through the day; but should works of necessity admit of some relaxation to the slaves, the constant round of visiting practised among slaveholders on the Sabbath will keep the slaves employed from morning to evening in serving them. Besides all this, many slaveholders compel their slaves to labor in the field on the Sabbath; others, by withholding a scanty allowance of victualling, compel them to labor on the Sabbath for their support.

The profound ignorance in which the slaves are held, of necessity occasions the breach of the Sabbath-day, because the Sabbath cannot be kept holy to the Lord in any acceptable form, but by holiness in heart, life, and conversation; and none that are ignorant of God's word, of his doctrines, his promises, or of the economy of grace and salvation, can keep the Sabbath holy to the Lord; so that the breach of the Sabbath is a necessary consequence of slaveholding.

THE FIFTH COMMANDMENT.

Twelfth—That practice must be criminal which occasions the breach of the fifth commandment, which is, "Honor thy father and thy mother." But slaveholding is of that description.

The fifth commandment requires the duty of parents to children, and the duties of children to their parents. The chief of all parental duties is that of teaching children the knowledge of God's word, the doctrines of religion, and the way of salvation through Jesus Christ: Prov. xxii. 6. "Train up a child in the way he should go, and when he is old he will not depart from it:" Deut. vi. 4. "Hear, O Israel, the Lord our God is one Lord; and thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thine heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might. And these words which I command thee this day, shall be in thine heart; and his slave, is offended at him, the laws and government relative to slaves, authorise the master to beat him; but the laws and government of the church forbid one brother to strike another under pain of church censure, while the rule of duty is so plainly expressed, that none need mistake it. Matthew xviii. 15: "Moreover, if thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him of his fault between thee and him alone. If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established; and if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it to the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican." As this rule gives him no authority to take satisfaction by beating his offending brother, but directs him to take opposite measures, it is impossible then to carry the government of the church into execution agreeable to the scripture, without combating the government of slaves.

Suppose the government of the church to prohibit slave-masters to strike or abuse their slaves that are in the same communion with themselves? It will amount to an emancipation of the slaves; for no one can be a slaveholder without possessing authority to compel the slaves to submit to his will.

Suppose the church to tolerate slave-masters to beat at discretion their slave-brethren without being amenable to the church, but not to grant the same indulgence to others who are not slaveholders, that is, to allow slaveholders to beat at discretion their slave brethren, but to excommunicate all others for the same treatment of their brethren, it would not only contradict the rule laid down in Scripture, but would be an example of the grossest partiality. Such a method is constantly practised in those congregations where slaveholding is not considered a term of communion; but it gives those societies more the aspect and features of dens of thieves, or synagogues of Satan, than societies of Christians, united in one faith, one baptism, and living as fellow heirs of the grace of life.

y brought back, placed again under the government of his master, and also that of the church. Suppose the master to libel the slave at the bar of the church, for the crime of deserting his service, how could the court condemn the slave for the crime of offending God and his brethren, when he had only attempted that which every member of the court would justify in himself had he been in the same condition with the slave. If they justify the slave they must condemn the master; for it is impossible that the master can be in duty bound to retain the slave in his service, and the slave in duty bound to desert it: it would suppose the moral law to be at war with itself. There is perhaps not a slave master living but would think it just in himself, were he a slave, to desert his master's service if he could. For a slave master, then, who is in the same fellowship of the church with his slave, to whip and abuse that slave merely for deserting his service, while in his conscience he could justify the same deed in his own person, would make him a complete image of the devil; but for an ecclesiastical court, professing to act in the name and by the authority of Jesus Christ, to pass a judicial censure upon a slave under the same circumstances, viewing it the same way as a deed that they could justify in themselves, would not only resemble the ordinary actions of the devil, but it could hardly be distinguished from a judicial act and deed of the great Pandemonian conclave.

5th. No court of Jesus Christ can restore an offending brother to the communion of the church again, but upon confession of his sin, and an engagement through divine aid to guard against a repetition of the same offence; but it is impossible to bring a slave to such a confession for deserting his master's service, without lying both to God and man. It would be contrary to the nature of man, and against his conscience even in a depraved state, except he was an idiot, and still more so if in a gracious state. A true child of God will apply to himself in all its force that apostolical precept, "Be ye not servants of men."

MAKES GOD A SLAVE.

Twenty-fourth—That practice must be criminal which tends to make a slave of God Almighty. But slaveholding is of that description.

1st. The slaveholder has a power to deprive the slave of the means of salvation, such as reading the word of God, teaching their families, meeting in congregations to hear the gospel preached, and of preventing them from the duties of secret prayer and family religion. These are God's ordinary ways of bringing sinners to the knowledge and enjoyment of salvation. If he saves sinners in any other way, it may be termed extraordinary, but not his common and ordinary way, for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.—Romans x. 17. The language of slaveholding is, if God will save the slaves, he must do it by some other way than that which is plainly revealed in his word; therefore slaveholding tends to make a slave of God himself; which was one of the national sins of Judah, that brought upon them the judgments of God. Isaiah xliii. 24 : "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins. Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities."

2d. The condition of a slave requires him to submit to the arbitrary will of his master; and whatsoever privileges he enjoys, whether spiritual or temporal, must flow through his sovereign permission; so that if God saves him at all in the ordinary way, it must be by the permission of the slave-master. If he speaks to the slave by his written word, it must be by the permission of the master. If he addresses him by the preaching of his word, it is by the permission of the master. If he meets the slave at the throne of grace in the ordinary hours of prayer, it must be by permission of the master, who can occupy all his time and labor so as to prevent the duty.

3d. The slaveholder gives to the slave no compensation for his labor, but holds it back by extortion, and equally deprives the God of heaven of that tribute of praise which is due to him from the slave. The business of slaveholding of necessity keeps the slaves in profound ignorance, so that if God saves them in any extraordinary way, he can have no tribute of praise, agreeable to his written word; for none are capable of making suitable returns of praise or gratitude to God for his goodness who have no knowledge of his word; so that slaveholding tends in every point to enslave God himself, as much as it does the persons of those who are actually in a state of slavery. It would be the highest degree of blasphemy to say, that the infinite God could be actually a slave ; but to say that slaveholders, by possessing an unlimited power over their slaves, and by keeping them in a state of profound ignorance, do their utmost to make him a slave, is neither blasphemy nor an untruth.

UNJUST TOWARDS GOD.

Twenty-fifth—That practice must be criminal which lays a foundation for injustice towards God, or furnishes a pretext for withholding from him the duties of praise and adoration, But slaveholding is of that nature.

If God has granted to men a moral right to rob one another of all their rights and privileges, and in particular the right of reading his word, and thereby to preclude the slaves from rendering to himself the duties of adoration and praise, they may on the same principle conclude, that they may, with equal impunity, rob him of his declarative glory by withholding all acts of adoration and praise : the conclusion is as natural and just as that the number 4 is the necessary result of the addition of 2 and 2. It is most probable that this process of argument is the chief reason why a family of pious slaveholders who occupy the station in its proper character, with its necessary appendages, is as rare to be found in a slave state, as a company of white crows on the plains of Sandusky. But the last result of this process of reasoning is most liable to be speculative atheism ; because that man who is once led to believe it his duty to occupy a station in the moral world which empowers him with impunity to contravene all moral obligations relative to his fellow men, with a right to transmit the same office and power to his posterity forever, may readily conclude that either the God of the universe delights in acts of injustice and robbery among men, or else that there is no God at all. The first he cannot admit, as it would make him a devil. He will then be apt to conclude that either slaveholding must be criminal, or there is no God. But his persisting in the practice is an indication that he at least says in his heart, there is no God.

AGAINST INFANT BAPTISM.

Twenty-sixth—If infant baptism is an ordinance of God, slaveholding must be wrong.

The baptism of infants is in no respect a duty, but when parents or guardians come under vows to train up their infants in the nurture and admonition of the Lord; because no child having arrived to the years of understanding, can be bound by a baptismal covenant to apply the blessings sealed in baptism, nor the obligations of the moral law, if it has never been taught to know them. A knowledge of duty is essential to the being of a baptismal obligation to perform duty. If no person is bound to teach the child its duty when it is capable of being taught, the ordinance is void. But slaveholding prevents the possibility of slave parents from coming under baptismal vows for their children, because their children are all robbed from them as soon as born, and are liable to be sold and dispersed throughout the world; and if they were even suffered to remain with them, they have no power to instruct them farther than their masters grant them indulgence; therefore to require slave parents to come under vows for their children in baptism would be a profanation of the ordinance. For the masters of slaves to take on them baptismal vows for their slave children; would be still worse. It would imply an administration of the ordinance, without either a promise for encouragement or a precept to authorize it, and imply a dedication to the Lord of that which the person dedicating had no right to possess, but obtained it from the parents by violence; whereas God has said that he hates robbery for burnt offering.

Objection.—Abraham was commanded to circumcise all born in his house, and bought with his money.—Genesis, xvii. 13.

Answer.—It has been already shewn that Abraham's servants were not slaves.

Again; the command of God to Abraham to circumcise all born in his house or bought with his money, was a method of preventing them from ever being slaves, and their children after them forever; because their circumcision initiated them into the church, and secured to them liberty, with all the civil and religious privileges of the Jewish people. But for a slaveholder to have his slaves baptized, admitting they were his lawful property, would be a ratification of their bondage, because the baptism of a person is not only a ratification of the new covenant promises, but a seal and ratification of all the obligations of the moral law upon that person. If then slaveholding was morally right, the baptism of slaves would rivet the chains of bondage upon them—if wrong, it would be a giving the lie both to God and man, by an ostensible ratification of bondage upon the slaves, in direct contradiction to the law of God, and prove a strong temptation to slave masters to believe a lie, that is, to believe they were doing God service by keeping their neighbors and brethren in a state of unmerited bondage. It would also imply an application of God's promises sealed in baptism, to enable them to perpetrate most atrocious wickedness, and a most daring attempt to make God a partaker with them in sin; therefore to admit slaveholders to be sponsors for their slave children in baptism, must be a piece of consummate wickedness.

AGAINST ALL LAWS, DIVINE AND HUMAN.

Twenty-seventh—That practice must be sinful which is not conformable to any law either divine or human. But slaveholding is of that nature.

That the practice of slaveholding is contrary to the moral law, has been abundantly shown, therefore all the support it can be supposed to have, must be drawn from the civil law; but no civil authority can make that to be right which is morally wrong, yet a civil precept may be morally wrong on the part of the authority commanding, which may be innocently obeyed, as when the matter of the obedience required may be done without violating any moral precept. Thus, exorbitant duties on articles of commerce may be paid, oppressive taxes may be discharged, and a slave may, in obedience to his master, labor without wages. The matter of obedience in these cases and such like being indifferent, the authority may be obeyed without sin; but when the civil authority commands the subjects to fight in an unjust war, or the slaveholder commands the slave to labor on the Sabbath,

3. Slaveholding has a most pernicious effect on the families of slaveholders; they are raised in idleness, vanity and pride, and in utter unfitness to acquire a livelihood by manual labor; which, when succeeded by a change of fortune from wealth to poverty, renders their condition most deplorable. The case would be quite different, if, with the privilege of holding slaves, the legislative authorities of slave states had systematized their tyrannical codes, by entailing the estates of slaveholders, to prevent their being executed for the discharge of debts; but as the case now stands, when there are so many vicissitudes of fortune, and changes from affluence to poverty, these direful effects are not only common, but may be still expected where slavery prevails.

4. Slaveholding has a tendency to introduce disorder into families, by proving a temptation to masters and their sons, living in idleness, (either by flattery or force,) to make undue encroachments on the chastity of their female slaves, the offspring of which is a mixed blood, which causes discontentment to the lawful partner of the husband's bed, and shame and vexation to his legitimate children. The frequency of these abominable practices in every slave neighborhood, shows that it is a necessary consequence of slavery.

5. It tends to destroy natural affection, and even to brutalize the feelings of human nature. In virtue of the laws of slave states, all children born of female slaves are devoted to perpetual hereditary slavery; in consequence of which, it is no uncommon thing for fathers to sell their own children, to be slaves to perpetual generations, to be subject to the whole system of misery which belongs to a state of slavery. It is true, that for a man to sell the children of another is in some respects worse than to sell his own, yet there are circumstances of peculiar horror belonging to each of them, that are not in the same sense as applicable to both. To sell the children of another person appears the most devilish, because in that case the seller has no moral right of property in the child that he violently wrenches from the parents, but in the latter case the father has a right of property in his own child at least, until it arrives unto the age of twenty-one. Therefore, in the case of a man selling his own children for slaves, case of slave holders trying their slaves for petty crimes, nothing is more common than to put them to the most cruel torture, merely to find out whether they are guilty or not, and also to compel them to accuse others. In the course of such trials many innocent persons suffer, and many innocent persons are accused by such as are under torture merely to alleviate their misery.

3d. Many slaves are condemned and executed for breaking the laws, while by force they are restrained from that instruction which is requisite to know the laws of men, and at the same time their punishments are greater than those of freemen. Thus slaves in many instances are punished with death for crimes, which only subject freemen to the penitentiary. This partiality is the more shocking, that the crimes of freemen are committed against laws which they have every opportunity of knowing, while the slaves are denied the right of using the means that are requisite to know the laws, and yet are subject to heavier punishments. This partial procedure in the administration of justice, is directly contrary to the word of God. Luke xii. 47 : "That servant who knew his Lord's will and prepared not himself, neither did according to his will, shall be beaten with many stripes. But he that knew not and did commit things worthy of stripes, shall be beaten with few stripes." But partiality in the distribution of penalties to slaves and freemen, is necessarily attached to slavery ; because slavery is itself the same kind of punishment with the penitentiary ; and to condemn a slave to the penitentiary, would be no additional punishment.

Therefore, as one sin leads to another, the sin of slaveholding necessarily leads to the sin of murder. If death is a punishment greater than the crime deserves, it is murder. If it is no greater, why is not the freeman punished the same way. Therefore partiality in the administration of justice is a necessary consequence of slaveholding.

VIOLATES THE RIGHTS OF CONSCIENCE.

Twenty-ninth—That practice must be criminal which cannot be supported without persecution, and an open violation of the rights of conscience. But slaveholding is of that description.

1st. Slaveholding cannot be supported in any state or kingdom, without imperiously restraining the slaves from the means of knowledge. But all who enjoy the means of knowledge, are in duty bound, according to their stations and circumstances, to teach the ignorant by making them acquainted with God's word, which implies a knowledge of his law, his gospel, his doctrines, and the whole duty of man. But the laws of slave states by fines and penalties, prevent the free inhabitants from teaching the slaves to read the word of God, even though they found themselves most solemnly bound by the word of God and their own consciences to instruct them, therefore persecution is necessary for the support of slavery.

2d. But all mankind who have access to the Scriptures are bound to search them. John v. 39 : "Search the Scriptures." This obligation is upon us all, both black and white, and the Scripture is a gift of God to all, containing a precious treasure of all things pertaining to life and godliness. 2. Timothy, iii. 16 : "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness, that the man of God may be perfect, thoroughly furnished unto all good works." But it is impossible to search the Scriptures, or to enjoy all those spiritual advantages without learning to read. Suppose, then, a slave to feel bound in his conscience to learn to read the word of God, (and there are numerous examples of this sort) the attempt would be repelled by force and power, and if persisted in would expose him to torture. If private Christians attempt to learn them to read on the Lord's day, they are violently prevented by bands of patrolers, who have authority to disperse the blacks if more than four or five are found together, except they are immediately under the eyes of masters or overseers. In some slave states the attempt would expose the teachers to fines and imprisonment.

Suppose a slave to possess gifts to fit him to preach the everlasting gospel, it is without all doubt the indispensable duty of the church to ordain him to that office. But if he should be ordained, he is prevented by tyrannical power f from going forth to preach the gospel to every creature.

r And that church judicature which would call him forth
1 from his unlawful subjection to his ungodly tyrant to fulfil f his office would be treated as dangerous enemies, and if 3 persisted in, would cause them to suffer by the hands of the 1 executioner. In most of the slave states the laws are such as to prevent any preachers of the gospel from attempting to collect the black people into congregations for the purpose of hearing the gospel preached, and the blacks would be cruelly tortured if found in that situation. From all which it may be safely concluded, that with all our boasted freedom and rights of conscience established by the federal constitution, that there is now and constantly carried on in the United States a most cruel persecution, and nothing prevents it from being as sanguinary as in the reign of bloody Mary, but faithfulness in Christian professions.

But there are circumstances of horror on the side of American persecutors, which makes their guilt infinitely more aggravated than that of the persecutors in Mary's reign, or even of the inquisitors in Spain or Portugal.
Those polished persecutors were apt to have the glory of God for their motive or end, and were liable to think they were doing God service. But our persecutors have no ostensible motive but gain. Under the Popish persecutions, the people were not compelled to labor on the Lord's day; but under American persecution, the slaves are liable to be compelled to labor on the Sabbath, or suffer torture. If in some slave states there are some partial laws against masters compelling their slaves to labor on the Sabbath, they can be of little account where a master is so disposed; because the slave testimony is not admissible in any court. Little more than a year ago, two brothers in Gallatin county, in the state of Kentucky, ordered their slaves to labor on the Sabbath.
Upon their refusal, they were put to the torture, scourged most unmercifully until they submitted to the will of the tyrants, and also bowed down on their knees imploring their pardon. One of them was a professor of religion; and although he complied to labor on the Sabbath, yet would not dishonor his God by bowing down to worship any fellow mortal; on account of which his common calamity. This marked difference in the providence of God between the white population and the blacks, who are no part of the nation, as a political body, is exactly similar to the distinction, that divine providence made between Israel and the Egyptians in the time of the ten plagues. Exodus, 7th chapter to the 12th: If we consider mankind in their private stations and relations to one another, we may say with Solomon, in that case, Eccl. ix. 1, 2, that, generally speaking, "no man knoweth either love or hatred by all that is before them, but one event happeneth to all;" but the reason why one event happens to mankind in their individual capacities, is because it is the will of God, that sentence should not be speedily executed, against an evil work, but that it should be reserved unto the general judgment, yet national sins are not reserved to the general judgment, because nations cannot then be punished in their national capacities, but have always been, both in ancient and modern times, punished in this world by national judgments. It can be no just objection to this view of the subject, that natural causes may be assigned for the marked difference of the effects produced by the pestilence upon the black and white population, such as that the constitutions of the former are better adapted to the climate than the latter, because we find by experience that in all climates on our continent, the same difference has been manifested, which shows that the first cause is of the moral kind, and that it is the national crime of slaveholding unrepented of and persisted in.

AT WAR WITH THE CHURCH.

Twenty-third—If the government of slaves and that of the church are at open war with one another, slaveholding must be wrong: but the government of slaves is at open war with the government of the church; therefore slaveholding must be wrong.

The government of the church takes cognizance of fraud and theft, such as defrauding the hireling of his wages; wages due to a person, always supposes a covenant or agreement between the hireling and the employer; the ground upon which the employer is bound to pay wages enjoying consolation under their sufferings from God's promises; but slaveholding persecutors completely prevent their slaves from knowing the will of God, and render them incapable of suffering for his sake, or of enjoying any consolations from his promises under their afflictions; and thus, as far as they can, try to make them miserable in body and mind, both for time and eternity, so that the character of a real slaveholder assimilates more nearly to that of the devil than any popish persecutor of which we have any knowledge from history.

While preparing these sheets for the press, we have authentic accounts of more than fifty martyrs suffering death in Charleston, S. C., for the cause of civil liberty, or for attempting that which their cruel persecutors and murderers would have considered heroic virtue in their own persons, if their condition had been the same with that of the slaves. So that slaveholding is a system of wickedness, and necessarily requires for its support most cruel and bloody persecution of the innocent, particularly of such as for conscience' sake would attempt to defend their civil and religious liberties, of such also, as for conscience' sake desire to read the Bible, that they may know the way of salvation, and of those who, from the same motives would attempt to enlighten the minds of these benighted heathen in their present condition; so that none of our modern scribes and pharisees need build the sepulchres of the Protestant martyrs, and say, if we had lived in the day of our fathers, we would not have been partakers with them in the blood of the martyrs. Wherefore ye are witnesses unto yourselves that ye are the children of them who killed the martyrs; fill ye up the measure of your fathers. Ye serpents, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell.

WILL NOT ADMIT OF PRAYER.

Thirtieth—That practice must be criminal which will not admit of an evangelical prayer to God for its support. But slaveholding is of that description.

1st. Prayer is an offering up of our desires to God for things agreeable to his will, in the name of Christ, with thankful acknowledgments of his mercies. When we pray to God, two things are necessary for its acceptance.

his slave, is offended at him, the laws and government relative to slaves, authorise the master to beat him; but the laws and government of the church forbid one brother to strike another under pain of church censure, while the rule of duty is so plainly expressed, that none need mistake it. Matthew xviii. 15: "Moreover, if thy brother trespass against thee, go and tell him of his fault between thee and him alone. If he shall hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother; but if he will not hear thee, then take with thee one or two more, that in the mouth of two or three witnesses every word may be established; and if he shall neglect to hear them, tell it to the church; but if he neglect to hear the church, let him be unto thee as an heathen man and a publican." As this rule gives him no authority to take satisfaction by beating his offending brother, but directs him to take opposite measures, it is impossible then to carry the government of the church into execution agreeable to the scripture, without combating the government of slaves.

Suppose the government of the church to prohibit slave-masters to strike or abuse their slaves that are in the same communion with themselves? It will amount to an emancipation of the slaves; for no one can be a slaveholder without possessing authority to compel the slaves to submit to his will.

Suppose the church to tolerate slave-masters to beat at discretion their slave-brethren without being amenable to the church, but not to grant the same indulgence to others who are not slaveholders, that is, to allow slaveholders to beat at discretion their slave brethren, but to excommunicate all others for the same treatment of their brethren, it would not only contradict the rule laid down in Scripture, but would be an example of the grossest partiality. Such a method is constantly practised in those congregations where slaveholding is not considered a term of communion; but it gives those societies more the aspect and features of dens of thieves, or synagogues of Satan, than societies of Christians, united in one faith, one baptism, and living as fellow heirs of the grace of life.

4th. Suppose a slave in the same fellowship of the church with his master, should desert his service, at a time when he had a rational prospect of escaping, but was unexpected-

ness, and his chambers by wrong, that useth his neighbor's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work." It would even amount to blasphemy to suppose that there could be a promise in God's word that would secure his blessing to acts of theft and robbery ; therefore there is not a promise in the Bible for a slaveholder to plead upon for strength to support him in the practice of slaveholding, and it is highly probable that there never was an example of one who coolly and deliberately prayed to God for Christ's sake to assist him in forcibly restraining his neighbors from enjoying freedom, and to enable him to exact his labor without wages. That which appears to approach the nearest to it, was the case of a slaveholder in York county, state of Pennsylvania above thirty years ago, who owned some slaves, one of whom, through hard usage, was in the habit of running away, but was brought back to his owner one morning before the usual form of family devotion was past. The slave was instantly suspended in the air by his two hands with his toes just touching the ground, when, after they had beaten him with an unmerciful number of stripes, they left him in the same condition, retired within the house, performed family worship, returned when done, and gave the poor slave the remainder of his punishment.

If the fact now related tends to fill the mind with horror, how would it shock humanity to listen to a tale of one attempting to pray to God to enable him to keep his neighbors from ever enjoying liberty more ; and to assist him in withholding from him the due reward of his labor, and to bless his endeavors to keep his slaves in a state of profound ignorance.

But as the Scripture makes it the duty of all men to pray, slaveholders are equally in duty bound to pray ; and, in praying, to plead with God for grace and strength to help them to perform every branch of incumbent duty with all their might. If slaveholding is a duty, it must lay the master under an obligation to pray to God for strength and wisdom to fulfil his duty according to the true nature and tendency of the practice. It may not be amiss then to lay down a FORM OF PRAYER FOR SLAVEHOLDERS, adapted to the proper nature of the business, and suited to the office and station of a slaveholder.

1st. The slaveholder has a power to deprive the slave of the means of salvation, such as reading the word of God, teaching their families, meeting in congregations to hear the gospel preached, and of preventing them from the duties of secret prayer and family religion. These are God's ordinary ways of bringing sinners to the knowledge and enjoyment of salvation. If he saves sinners in any other way, it may be termed extraordinary, but not his common and ordinary way, for faith cometh by hearing, and hearing by the word of God.—Romans x. 17. The language of slaveholding is, if God will save the slaves, he must do it by some other way than that which is plainly revealed in his word; therefore slaveholding tends to make a slave of God himself; which was one of the national sins of Judah, that brought upon them the judgments of God. Isaiah xliii. 24: "Thou hast made me to serve with thy sins. Thou hast wearied me with thine iniquities."

2d. The condition of a slave requires him to submit to the arbitrary will of his master; and whatsoever privileges he enjoys, whether spiritual or temporal, must flow through his sovereign permission; so that if God saves him at all in the ordinary way, it must be by the permission of the slave-master. If he speaks to the slave by his written word, it must be by the permission of the master. If he addresses him by the preaching of his word, it is by the permission of the master. If he meets the slave at the throne of grace in the ordinary hours of prayer, it must be by permission of the master, who can occupy all his time and labor so as to prevent the duty.

3d. The slaveholder gives to the slave no compensation for his labor, but holds it back by extortion, and equally deprives the God of heaven of that tribute of praise which is due to him from the slave. The business of slaveholding of necessity keeps the slaves in profound ignorance, so that if God saves them in any extraordinary way, he can have no tribute of praise, agreeable to his written word; for none are capable of making suitable returns of praise or gratitude to God for his goodness who have no knowledge of his word; so that slaveholding tends in every point to enslave God himself, as much as it does the persons of those who are actually in a state of slavery. It would be of these turbulent passions. We have, by the authority of our civil rulers, who are thy ministers, and by our own sovereign power, put a final stop to all schemes, designs, or attempts to teach our subjects the knowledge of reading, writing, or any branch of science, for this laudable reason, that the more they know, they are so much more noisy in pleading for natural rights; and the less they know, they are so much easier governed. We can appeal to thy omniscience, that ignorance in our subjects is essential to the permanent existence of our government. We beseech thee, for the sake of our supreme dominion, to grant us the true spirit of our station; that when any of our subjects attempt to reason with us in favor of natural rights, we may maintain the majesty of our rank, by attempting no refutation but by the logic of the rod or whip. Enable us, we beseech thee, to display our dignity by a noble liberality and readiness to entertain strangers, especially ladies and gentlemen of rank and fortune; and to sympathize with all such poor of the land as we cannot make subject to our despotical power; but all such as we either have, or may hereafter bring under our yoke, may we have spirit and energy to rule with a rod of iron. Enable us to keep our subjects from the use of the Bible, and bless all our endeavors to prevent them from learning to read it; and grant to them such a degree of stupidity and want of concern about their eternal state, as to have no inclination to read the Bible or any other book. Shut up all their intellectual faculties, so as they may know nothing but obedience to their master's commands. Lord, keep from within our borders all preachers of the Gospel, except such as are slaveholders themselves; that when they are led to preach upon the subject of slavery, they may never attempt to prove their doctrine from the Scripture, but prove the sense of the Scripture from their doctrine. Teach us the most prudent methods of exacting from our good slaves as large a portion of hard labor as they may at all be able to bear without entirely sinking under the load; and keeping us from killing our bad ones by any other method than hard labor. Grant to all our subjects that patience under their privations and sufferings which belongs to slavery; and let them see that our dominion over them must be just, seeing that, in all points in which it tends to enslave them, it tends to enslave thee; and that, as the God of heaven serves with our sovereign will, they, poor reptiles, need not hesitate to do the same. Forgive the superstition of our brethren in sovereignty, who, from conscientious scruples about the condition of slaves, have made some feeble attempts to learn them to read the Bible. Teach them to know that the future happiness of slaves need be no matter of concern with slaveholders; because they and their slaves can never dwell together in the same heaven. Forgive not the sin of those who have liberated their slaves and thereby cast odium upon us, as we cannot forgive them. Lead us not into compassion for the temporal or eternal miseries of slaves. Deliver us from the evil of sympathy for them when under the discipline of the rod or whip; or for parents, when we tear from them their infants, to be disposed of for money; and from commiseration for those of our subjects who may be spectators to their near relations under the torture of the whip, or the excruciating torment of the saline solution, liberally applied to the lacerated back, and for those children who may be sometimes compelled to scourge their parents. Save us from ever being slaves to the blacks in hell, as they have been to us upon earth: and may ours be the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. AMEN.

HINDERS THE SUCCESS OF THE GOSPEL.

Lastly—From the small success of the gospel in slave states when compared with the free states, it may be discerned that there is some public, notorious, God-dishonoring conduct persisted in, which renders it inconsistent with the glory of God and the honor of Christianity to make the means of grace effectual among them. This may be evinced from two reasons. One is, that there is no promise of success with the administration of the gospel where the whole counsel of God is not declared. But preachers of the gospel in slave states do not declare from the word of God his displeasure at the practice of slaveholding, but are apt to encourage it by their own example. 2dly. We cannot expect that God will bless the means of grace to any people, who, for the sake of indulging themselves in the worst kind of extortion, will withhold the same means from all under their power, and thus deprive them of their spiritual rights as well as temporal. Neither have we any reason to think that God will accept the persons and religious services of those who are already professors of religion, while they are engaged in the same hell-deserving practice. Prov. xv. 8: "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord." How applicable to such a people are the Lord's words addressed to the apostleizing Jews. Isaiah i., 10—20: "Hear the word of the Lord, ye rulers of Sodom, give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah. To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me, saith the Lord. I am full of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts, and I delight not in the blood of lambs or of he-goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hands to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations. Incense is an abomination unto me. The new moons and Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with. It is iniquity. Even the solemn meeting, your new moons, and your appointed feasts, my soul hateth. These are an abomination unto me. I am weary to bear them; and when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you. Yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear. Your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes. Cease to do evil, learn to do well. Seek judgment, relieve the oppressed. Judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now, let us reason together, saith the Lord. Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow. Though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. If ye be willing and obedient ye shall eat the good of the land. But if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

CHAPTER IV.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF SLAVERY.

Some time previous to my entering upon the present subject, a fragment of a pamphlet came into my hands, which had been designed for a defence of slavery, the title-page of which was gone, and a considerable part of the work itself. I labored by inquiry in different directions to get one entire, but found it impossible; which led me to conclude that either by excessive reading it had become in a manner extinct, or else, through want of reading and neglect, it had become a prey to the moths, the moles, and the bats. In the part which fell into my hands, I found nothing worthy of notice, except three things, in pages sixteen and seventeen.

ARGUMENT FIRST.—Our author asserts that the business of emancipation belongs to the legislative authority, but not to the church of God as such.

ANSWER FIRST.—If the slaves were public property, or belonged to the commonwealth as such, the government might dispose of them at pleasure. Neither could the church or any other particular society take cognizance of their case more than that of enlisted soldiers, who are public property. But the slaves are not public property; they are recognized by the government, and by the laws of every slave state, as private property, as much as houses, lands, or cattle, that are lawfully purchased. Admitting that slaveholding was just, the legislature could have no more right to emancipate the slaves than they have a right to deprive any of the citizens of their houses, lands, or cattle. Therefore the business, if morally right, is a matter with which the legislature cannot interfere. If it is morally wrong, it is the business of the legislature to rectify that wrong, by establishing rules of justice throughout the community, to suppress the practice. It must also be the business of every member of the community, because the people themselves are the government, and the members of the legislature are only their agents. Therefore, as the people are the proper constituents of government, it is their place to take an active part, both by counsel, advice, example, and in electing representatives, to try to emancipate the slaves.

ANSWER SECOND.—If the practice is wrong, the holders of slaves cannot retain them by force one day, without contracting guilt, so that if the legislature is in duty bound to suppress slavery, it must be because that slaveholders neglect their duty, and that neglect calls forth the exertion of the legislature, therefore the emancipation of slaves is first the business of the private possessors of them.

That the churches of God are eminently concerned in the business of emancipation is manifest.

1st, Because Christians, through the light of the gospel and the influence of the Divine Spirit, are liable to have more correct ideas of the extent and spirituality of the moral law, and its obligations upon all ranks of society, than others; therefore their superior knowledge and experience lay them under peculiar obligations to use their best endeavors to have the slave emancipated. God's word testifies that to whom much is given, of them much is required.

2d. The church of God is forbidden to give that which is holy to the dogs, or to cast his pearls before swine. That is, to dispense the holy seals of his covenant, and grant other peculiar privileges of his house to such as are ignorant or scandalous. If slaveholding is sinful, it is so exceeding sinful that if any class of sinners may be compared to dogs or swine, slaveholders may.

3d. The church of Christ are bound, as faithful witnesses for Christ, and agents called to officiate in his name when they admit members to church fellowship, to make a difference between the clean and the unclean, and are forbidden to make the table of the Lord a table of devils, so that they are bound to take cognizance of every criminal act or practice as far as it may be known or persisted in. Neither ought the decisions of the legislature or of any civil court to have any influence over an ecclesiastical court respecting the terms of communion. If the church must be governed by the legislature in the admission or non-admission of slaveholders to fellowship, she may be governed by civil determinations in all matters of a moral kind, which would throw the whole power of ecclesiastical government into the hands of the civil authority, and make church officers to be mere tools of civil power, and recognize civil government as head of the church; therefore the practice of slaveholding comes as directly under the special cognizance of church courts, as horse stealing or any other transgression of the moral law, and is as much more deserving of excommunication, as man stealing is worse than horse stealing.

It appears that a more shocking declaration can hardly be imagined than that of our author. If slaveholding is lawful, it surely belongs to the church to justify it, and to pray for its support. If it is immoral, it belongs to the church to purge herself of so criminal a practice. But the doctrine inculcated by the author, is highly worthy of a slaveholder, whose station as such makes him head over all the concerns of his slaves, and all relations and relative duties, both civil and spiritual; and the same arguments which go to justify a slave-master in officiating as head over all the spiritual and temporal concerns of the slaves, will equally justify the civil authority in assuming headship over the church.

One is, that the thing for which we pray must be lawful. The other is, that there must be some gospel promises which has a relation to the things sought by prayer, which the person praying must plead upon.

1st. First then, the things sought by prayer must be lawful, for prayer to God implies an appeal to him with all the solemnities of an oath, that the things we ask are in their nature lawful. But there is no precept of the moral law that will make it lawful to steal the property of another, or to rob him of his possessions. But the liberty of a man is his property, and the labor of a man is his property; it is that by which he lives. The children of parents are their property, more precious than any other earthly goods. To take all of these from our neighbors, whom we are bound by the law and the prophets to love as ourselves, is the greatest outrage upon moral justice that is possible to be committed in either earth or hell. Yea, it is atheism, for the slaveholder exalts himself above all that is called God, as will appear from two reasons.

(1.) God never exacts any service from his rational creatures, without a compensation; because his creation and preservation of them is of infinitely more value than all their services.

(2.) The slaveholder, by his office and station, has a power to supersede all the precepts of God's laws in relation to the slave, both as to acts of religious worship and all relative duties which he owes to mankind as the duties of parents to children, and those of children to parents. No slave can take time or use any means to know the will of God, or to worship him, nor power to teach his family, or to require obedience from his family, nor can children obey their parents but through the sovereign will of the master, so that slaveholding is so far from being sanctioned by the law of God, that it is the highest degree of wickedness and contrariety to the law of God.

Where, then, can a man be found on the globe who can appeal to God with all the solemnity of an oath, and say, that slaveholding is a duty commanded by his law.

2d. There is no promise in the gospel to secure the blessing of God to any person in the business of keeping slaves, but there are some curses. Jeremiah, xxii. 13: "Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong, that useth his neighbor's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work." It would even amount to blasphemy to suppose that there could be a promise in God's word that would secure his blessing to acts of theft and robbery ; therefore there is not a promise in the Bible for a slaveholder to plead upon for strength to support him in the practice of slaveholding, and it is highly probable that there never was an example of one who coolly and deliberately prayed to God for Christ's sake to assist him in forcibly restraining his neighbors from enjoying freedom, and to enable him to exact his labor without wages. That which appears to approach the nearest to it, was the case of a slaveholder in York county, state of Pennsylvania above thirty years ago, who owned some slaves, one of whom, through hard usage, was in the habit of running away, but was brought back to his owner one morning before the usual form of family devotion was past. The slave was instantly suspended in the air by his two hands with his toes just touching the ground, when, after they had beaten him with an unmerciful number of stripes, they left him in the same condition, retired within the house, performed family worship, returned when done, and gave the poor slave the remainder of his punishment.

If the fact now related tends to fill the mind with horror, how would it shock humanity to listen to a tale of one attempting to pray to God to enable him to keep his neighbors from ever enjoying liberty more ; and to assist him in withholding from him the due reward of his labor, and to bless his endeavors to keep his slaves in a state of profound ignorance.

But as the Scripture makes it the duty of all men to pray, slaveholders are equally in duty bound to pray ; and, in praying, to plead with God for grace and strength to help them to perform every branch of incumbent duty with all their might. If slaveholding is a duty, it must lay the master under an obligation to pray to God for strength and wisdom to fulfil his duty according to the true nature and tendency of the practice. It may not be amiss then to lay down a FORM OF PRAYER FOR SLAVEHOLDERS, adapted to the proper nature of the business, and suited to the office and station of a slaveholder.

THE SLAVEHOLDER'S PRAYER.

ALMIGHTY GOD! I thank thee that I am not as other men are, or even as these sable sons and daughters of Africa, which in thy providence are under my dominion. I thank thee that I am an absolute sovereign, possessed of an incontrollable authority over my subjects; that I am accountable to none upon earth for the disposal of their persons, or the administration of my government over them. I desire to admire the condescension of my great Creator in permitting me to occupy a station in the moral world more significant of sovereign independence than his own. Thou dost never demand a tribute of humble service from any of thy subjects without a reward. But I can demand implicit obedience by the supremacy of my power, and the vengeance of my rod, without the humbling thought of diminishing my fortune, and robbing my infant offspring, by distributing rewards to my humble subjects. With an exalted sense of my magisterial dignity, my soul doth magnify the Lord, and praise the God of my exaltation. Thou dost rule by established laws, which must of necessity correspond with the relations which thou hast made to exist between thyself and thy creatures, and the natural relations which exist among thy creatures, and canst not, consistently with the honor of thy kingdom, make laws to contradict or invert the order of relative duties. But, in thy providence, I am placed in a station of absolute supremacy, in which my sovereign will is a law to my subjects. I can say to one, at any time, Go, and he goeth; and to another, Come, and he cometh. My will supersedes the relative obligations of rendering to thee the morning and evening sacrifice, by a rigorous demand of incessant labor, from the dawning light to the evening shade. I can say to one, Be married, and he must be married; and to another, Let thy marriage be dissolved, and it must be dissolved. I can say to my virgin slaves, Be fruitful, multiply, and replenish my plantation, and my command will be obeyed. I have an absolute power over conjugal relations, parental relations, and filial relations; and all the reciprocal duties of these relations, which the moral law would require of my subjects if they were not slaves, must yield to my despotical will. But O, Almighty Sovereign, though I am a debtor to thee for the exalted rank I occupy in the scale of moral existence, I must plead my inability to govern with discretion these my subjects, without I am taught the wisdom of the serpent and the vengeance of the tiger. I confess there is a kind of original sin, derived from our first father, Adam, which is peculiarly manifest in our subjects, by discontentment, and an unwillingness to submit to the authority of their lawful sovereigns, accompanied with murmurings and pleadings that they have the same right to freedom with their masters, making use of certain cant phrases, as—the rights of man—the right of worshiping God where and when they please—the right of learning to read the Bible—and some have had the assurance to plead their right of wages. These, almighty Sovereign, are some of the bitter fruits of Adam's fall; but thanks to thy goodness, thou hast endowed us sovereign potentates with power and wisdom to prevent the pernicious effects of these turbulent passions. We have, by the authority of our civil rulers, who are thy ministers, and by our own sovereign power, put a final stop to all schemes, designs, or attempts to teach our subjects the knowledge of reading, writing, or any branch of science, for this laudable reason, that the more they know, they are so much more noisy in pleading for natural rights; and the less they know, they are so much easier governed. We can appeal to thy omniscience, that ignorance in our subjects is essential to the permanent existence of our government. We beseech thee, for the sake of our supreme dominion, to grant us the true spirit of our station; that when any of our subjects attempt to reason with us in favor of natural rights, we may maintain the majesty of our rank, by attempting no refutation but by the logic of the rod or whip. Forgive not the sin of those who have liberated their slaves and thereby cast odium upon us, as we cannot forgive them. Lead us not into compassion for the temporal or eternal miseries of slaves. Deliver us from the evil of sympathy for them when under the discipline of the rod or whip; or for parents, when we tear from them their infants, to be disposed of for money; and from commiseration for those of our subjects who may be spectators to their near relations under the torture of the whip, or the excruciating torment of the saline solution, liberally applied to the lacerated back, and for those children who may be sometimes compelled to scourge their parents. Save us from ever being slaves to the blacks in hell, as they have been to us upon earth: and may ours be the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, for ever. AMEN.

HINDERS THE SUCCESS OF THE GOSPEL.

Lastly—From the small success of the gospel in slave states when compared with the free states, it may be discerned that there is some public, notorious, God-dishonouring conduct persisted in, which renders it inconsistent with the glory of God and the honor of Christianity to make the means of grace effectual among them. This may be evinced from two reasons. One is, that there is no promise of success with the administration of the gospel where the whole counsel of God is not declared. But preachers of the gospel in slave states do not declare from the word of God his displeasure at the practice of slaveholding, but are apt to encourage it by their own example. 2dly. We cannot expect that God will bless the means of grace to any people, who, for the sake of indulging themselves in the worst kind of extortion, will withhold the same means from all under their power, and thus deprive them of their spiritual rights as well as temporal. Neither have we any reason to think that God will accept the persons and religious services of those who are already professors of religion, while they are engaged in the same hell-deserving practice. Prov. xv. 8: "The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord." How applicable to such a people are the Lord's words addressed to the apostleizing Jews. Isaiah i., 10—20: "Hear the word of the Lord, ye rulers of Sodom, give ear unto the law of our God, ye people of Gomorrah. To what purpose is the multitude of your sacrifices unto me, saith the Lord. I am full of the burnt-offerings of rams, and the fat of fed beasts, and I delight not in the blood of lambs or of he-goats. When ye come to appear before me, who hath required this at your hands to tread my courts? Bring no more vain oblations. Incense is an abomination unto me. The new moons and Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies, I cannot away with. It is iniquity. Even the solemn meeting, your new moons, and your appointed feasts, my soul hateth. These are an abomination unto me. I am weary to bear them; and when ye spread forth your hands, I will hide mine eyes from you. Yea, when ye make many prayers, I will not hear. Your hands are full of blood. Wash you, make you clean; put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes. Cease to do evil, learn to do well. Seek judgment, relieve the oppressed. Judge the fatherless, plead for the widow. Come now, let us reason together, saith the Lord. Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be white as snow. Though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool. If ye be willing and obedient ye shall eat the good of the land. But if ye refuse and rebel, ye shall be devoured with the sword, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

CHAPTER IV.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF SLAVERY.

Some time previous to my entering upon the present subject, a fragment of a pamphlet came into my hands, which had been designed for a defence of slavery, the title-page of which was gone, and a considerable part of the work itself. I labored by inquiry in different directions to get one entire, but found it impossible; which led me to conclude that either by excessive reading it had become in a manner extinct, or else, through want of reading and neglect, it had become a prey to the moths, the moles, and the bats. In the part which fell into my hands, I found nothing worthy of notice, except three things, in pages sixteen and seventeen.

ARGUMENT FIRST.—Our author asserts that the business of emancipation belongs to the legislative authority, but not to the church of God as such.

ANSWER FIRST.—If the slaves were public property, or belonged to the commonwealth as such, the government might dispose of them at pleasure. Neither could the church or any other particular society take cognizance of their case more than that of enlisted soldiers, who are public property. But the slaves are not public property ; they are recognized by the government, and by the laws of every slave state, as private property, as much as houses, lands, or cattle, that are lawfully purchased. Admitting that slaveholding was just, the legislature could have no more right to emancipate the slaves than they have a right to deprive any of the citizens of their houses, lands, or cattle. Therefore the business, if morally right, is a matter with which the legislature cannot interfere. If it is morally wrong, it is the business of the legislature to rectify that wrong, by establishing rules of justice throughout the community, to suppress the practice. It must also be the business of every member of the community, because the people themselves are the government, and the members of the legislature are only their agents. Therefore, as the people are the proper constituents of government, it is their place to take an active part, both by counsel, advice, example, and in electing representatives, to try to emancipate the slaves.

ANSWER SECOND.—If the practice is wrong, the holders of slaves cannot retain them by force one day, without contracting guilt, so that if the legislature is in duty bound to suppress slavery, it must be because that slaveholders neglect their duty, and that neglect calls forth the exertion of the legislature, therefore the emancipation of slaves is first the business of the private possessors of them.

That the churches of God are eminently concerned in the business of emancipation is manifest.

1st, Because Christians, through the light of the gospel and the influence of the Divine Spirit, are liable to have more correct ideas of the extent and spirituality of the moral law, and its obligations upon all ranks of society, than others ; therefore their superior knowledge and experience lay them under peculiar obligations to use their best endeavors to have the slave emancipated. God's word testifies that to whom much is given, of them much is required.

2d. The church of God is forbidden to give that which is holy to the dogs, or to cast his pearls before swine. That is, to dispense the holy seals of his covenant, and grant other peculiar privileges of his house to such as are ignorant or scandalous. If slaveholding is sinful, it is so exceeding sinful that if any class of sinners may be compared to dogs or swine, slaveholders may.

8d. The church of Christ are bound, as faithful witnesses for Christ, and agents called to officiate in his name when they admit members to church fellowship, to make a difference between the clean and the unclean, and are forbidden to make the table of the Lord a table of devils, so that they are bound to take cognizance of every criminal act or practice as far as it may be known or persisted in. Neither ought the decisions of the legislature or of any civil court to have any influence over an ecclesiastical court respecting the terms of communion. If the church must be governed by the legislature in the admission or non-admission of slaveholders to fellowship, she may be governed by civil determinations in all matters of a moral kind, which would throw the whole power of ecclesiastical government into the hands of the civil authority, and make church officers to be mere tools of civil power, and recognize civil government as head of the church; therefore the practice of slaveholding comes as directly under the special cognizance of church courts, as horse stealing or any other transgression of the moral law, and is as much more deserving of excommunication, as man stealing is worse than horse stealing.

It appears that a more shocking declaration can hardly be imagined than that of our author. If slaveholding is lawful, it surely belongs to the church to justify it, and to pray for its support. If it is immoral, it belongs to the church to purge herself of so criminal a practice. But the doctrine inculcated by the author, is highly worthy of a slaveholder, whose station as such makes him head over all the concerns of his slaves, and all relations and relative duties, both civil and spiritual; and the same arguments which go to justify a slave-master in officiating as head over all the spiritual and temporal concerns of the slaves, will equally justify the civil authority in assuming headship over the church.

ARG. 2. Page 18, our author grants "That the act of subjecting the Africans to perpetual servitude, was a violation of equity which ought to be observed by nations in their transactions with one another." In the same page, says he, "The principles of operation upon which the political machine is set in motion, may make things proper or improper, which would not be so should the course of the civil establishment be different." The sense of our author's words in this argument appears to be to this effect, that the Africans were unjustly subjected to slavery at first, but that the principles upon which our government is put into operation may make things proper or improper, which would not be so should the course of the civil establishment be different. When these declarations are applied to the subject of African slavery, they must mean, that as the civil establishment can make things lawful which were immoral before, so our government having sanctioned slavery by law has made it lawful, although it was in its nature immoral before. Answer. Slavery is so far from being any thing upon which or by which our political machine was set in motion that the reverse is manifest from the very foundation of the constitution. (See the Declaration of Independence, page 1st.) "We hold these truths to be self evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights, that amongst these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." So that African slavery is so far from having a place in our political machine, or even from being a necessary production of it, that it is condemned by the Constitution, and is only permitted by the administration. Although laws have been passed to protect the citizens in holding slaves, yet no one is bound to either purchase slaves, or to hold them in possession; and although the civil authority did oblige the people to hold them it would be no reason why they should obey. Such a law, rather than the law of God, that forbids man-stealing under pain of death, it is a manifest conclusion from the author's words in the above citation; that the civil legislature of a nation has a power of changing the obligations of the moral law by making that to be just which the moral law condemns, and condemning that which it has made just, if a civil legislature has a right and power thus to invert the obligations of God's law in one case, it must have the same in all points of moral obligation. This is the doctrine of passive obedience with a witness though the civil authority may pass unjust laws that may be innocently obeyed. But the matter of obedience in such cases, is in its nature indifferent; but none will imagine that the business of holding men in a state of unmerited, involuntary, hereditary bondage is a matter of indifference, but that it comes immediately under the obligation of the moral law to either justify or condemn it.

ARG. 3. Page 23. "It is nonsense to say that those who use them as well as their bound condition of life will admit, deprive them of liberty. We cannot deprive a person of a thing of which he is not in possession. We find them in a state of privation; they may be used in this condition of servitude with full conformity to that summary of the divine law, do unto others as ye would they should do unto you."

ANSWER. Our author asserts that we cannot deprive a person of a thing of which he is not in possession. This declaration is at variance with innumerable facts. For example—many a child is deprived of an estate which it never had in possession, but had a just right to possess; and many Africans are deprived of a right to freedom which they never had in possession. The question at issue is not whether the African slaves ever possessed freedom, but whether they possess a right to be free; there is a right of freedom and a power of enjoying it. The Africans in a state of slavery have the same right to freedom with all mankind, but they possess not the power; for the power is on the side of the oppressors, while they have no comforter. For a people to lose the power of freedom, is no reason why they should lose their right to it, because it would suppose physical force to be the rule of human action; this would be the unavoidable consequence. If ever the Africans had a moral right to be free, and lost that right by physical force, it will suppose that it was first morally right for them to be free. But physical force has made it to be morally wrong. Our author then, taking it for granted that his position is just, with an air of triumph asserts, "That they may be used in their present condition of servitude, with full conformity to that summary of the divine law, 'Do to others as you would they should do to you.'" This rule is not to be applied to our passions or appetites. It goes upon principles of equity, and does not afford relief to all those demands which might exist in the breast of our neighbor.

Many of the covetous and extortioners have strained their inventive powers to wrest this text, but it will speak for itself. Our author, either from a consciousness of the impregnable force he had to encounter, or else from mere modesty, only undertakes the exposition of one part of the text, leaving out that part which is essential to the true application of the whole, the words as recorded, Matthew vii. 12, read thus: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them, for this is the law and the prophets." If he had taken in the first clause of the text, all things, it would have embraced every thing without exception, and in particular the right of freedom as well as the power of it. The sense of the words cannot be mistaken by any rational being, except such as are disposed to wrest it in accommodation to their own peculiar prejudices. It sufficiently guards against any such abuse as our author insinuates; the sense is plain and determined, "all things whatsoever," &c. That is, let the thing be what it may, if you wish another to do it to you, it lies imperiously upon you to do the very same for them also. So that the more that we give way to ungenerous and extravagant wishes of service from others around us, the heavier and more is the load of duty, which we bring upon ourselves; therefore the words can mean no other than this, that in all things in which it would be just and lawful for us to wish another to do a favor to us we should allow ourselves to do the same unto him. As this text relates to the case of slavery, we may put the same question to ourselves. If I and my posterity were subject to a state of unmerited, involuntary, hereditary slavery, could I reasonably wish that such as withhold liberty from me and my posterity, would release us from that bondage? If this would be a lawful wish, which none will dispute, it will necessarily follow that we should do the same to them who may be in bondage to us.

Again. If we wish the Africans to be in bondage to us, could we, upon their wishing our servitude to them, consent to be their slaves as they have been to us? If we could not, it is manifest that this text is at open war with our author's views of slavery, and it is impossible to keep any of mankind in a state of unmerited, involuntary slavery, with conformity to it as a summary of the divine law.

ARG.—1. A late writer on the subject of moral science whose name in the literary world is distinguished by the initial letters of graduation, D. D., LL. D., asserts in one page of his lectures, that slavery is contrary both to justice and humanity, and that the African trade for slaves is among the most atrocious inroads upon justice and humanity which have ever been practised in any age or nation; yet in the very next page he says, that neither justice nor humanity require that the master, who has become the innocent possessor of that property, should impoverish himself for the benefit of his slaves.

ANSWER.—It is impossible for a man to innocently possess what he knows to have been stolen. The act of removing the Africans from their native country, is not that in which the peculiar aggravation of man-stealing lies, but it consists in robbing them of their liberty, labor, time, and all their natural rights. If, then, the great sin of man-stealing lies in robbing men of all these, rather than in a violent removal of their persons from their native soil, it is impossible that another person, by paying a sum of money to purchase a right and power to continue the same robbery can be innocent, as if wickedness, by a mere transfer of the power of committing it, could by that remove of the agency become virtue.

It is certain that when a man makes a purchase of a slave, he buys him, soul and body; but it is obvious at first view that the soul and body, abstractly considered, are not the object of his purchase, but the man's time, liberty, labor, and all his natural rights are his chief objects, in order to make them serve his worldly interest, and this was the alone object the first man-thief had, when he removed him soul and body from Africa², therefore the man who pays his money to a slave trader for a slave, pays it for a power to act and carry into operation the same thing, which was the alone motive the first man-thief had in view in stealing the man, and is that property of the whole transaction which is most criminal. It is true that the man who buys a slave pays his money for him ; but it is also true that the first man-thief was at some expense to obtain him ; he spent his time, and risked his life, which are as valuable as money.

2d. The first act of stealing the man, and the second act of holding him in bondage, when both are considered abstractly, will be found to be equally criminal ; but the last, when its circumstances and consequences are taken into view, will be found to be much the worst. The first act implied double robbery ; it was a violent separation of husbands from their wives, and wives from their husbands, parents from their children, and children from their parents ; so that it implied double robbery, though one and the same transaction ; because in all cases wherein the husband is taken from the wife, the wife is taken from the husband, even though the local situation of the one remains stationary. The same holds true respecting the parents and children. But common slaveholding implies the same double robbery. As

If an husband is purchased, and removed from his wife and children, he is then robbed from them, and his wife and children are equally robbed from him. The robbery is the same, whether the husband is by violence taken from his wife, or the wife from her husband, it is still double robbery ; and if the parents are sold from the children, or the children from the parents, it is robbery in relation to both, or double robbery. Let the crime, then, of man-stealing in the first instance be considered abstract from the mere local removal of their persons, and compared with common slaveholding, it will be found that the crime of stealing men from Africa and holding them in slavery in America, are essentially the same, and of equal aggravation ; their removal from their place of nativity in Africa, is no worse than their removal in America from their places of nativity, which is constantly done by slaveholders. But it has been already demonstrated that the common slaveholder is much more criminal in other respects than the first man-thief; the first only steals and sells the first generation, but obliges no purchaser to steal their children, yet slaveholders steal every child as soon as it is born, and entail the same theft upon their own posterity to all generations, and the same bondage upon the slaves and their children to the end of time. When the two citations from the doctor's book are compared, they exhibit a perfect paradox in the science of morals, and when further illustrated in the same lecture, tend to show and establish one of three things; either that long habit or custom has a power of turning the most atrocious wickedness into virtue, or else that the most atrocious wickedness, by a transfer of the power of committing it, will turn it to virtue; or that this hideous metamorphosis is effected by the sanction of civil authority; all or any of which might have very consistently dropped from the pen of an infidel philosopher, some of whom have denied the existence of any law but the civil authority. But to come from the pen of a Christian divine, exhibits a character resembling that beast that came up out of the earth, which had two horns like a lamb, but spake as a dragon.—Rev. xiii. 11.

CHAPTER V.

THE ARGUMENT FROM SCRIPTURE.

Having now proved by a course of abstract reasoning, that slaveholding is sinful, we shall attempt to establish the same position from the Scriptures of the Old and New Testament.

The first portion of scripture to which the reader's attention is directed, is Job xxxi. 39. In this chapter, Job pleads his cause against the harsh insinuations of his friends. Let the 39th verse be compared with verse 13, in which he shows how equitably he dealt with his servants. The two places, when compared, will show that the servants mentioned in the 13th verse, whose cause he vindicated, were hired-servants, and that he not only abhorred the idea of slavery, but even called down the vengeance of heaven upon his estate, if he exacted labor from his servants without wages, v. 39 : "If I have eaten the fruits of my land without money, or have caused the owners thereof to lose their life, let thistles grow instead of wheat, and cockle instead of barley." In chapter xxiv, Job gives the character of the wicked by their cruel oppression of the poor, which comes precisely up to the practice of modern slaveholding. Verse 7 : "They cause the naked to lodge without covering in the cold, they are wet with the showers of the mountain, and embrace the rock for want of shelter. They cause him to go naked without clothing, and take away the sheaf from the hungry, who make oil within their walls, and tread their wine presses and suffer thirst." It cannot be proved that slavery was sanctioned in the days of Job, by the laws of any state or kingdom, yet it appears to have been so far patronised by some petty tyrants, as to have the principal features of modern slavery ; such as that of making their domestics to go in a manner naked without clothing, so as to be exposed to the inclemency of the weather. It was also a practice with tyrannical masters to separate the children from the parents by violence : "They pluck the fatherless from the breast." To withhold wages from the laborer, is called taking the sheaf from the hungry. They also withheld a due allowance of victualing, significantly expressed by oil, even when they made it within their walls, and withheld drink from them, though forced to tread their wine presses. All this corresponds with the condition of slaves in our slave states, many of whom suffer hunger, thirst, and nakedness, amidst the abundant fruits of their own labor.

Ex. xxi. 16 : "He that stealeth a man and selleth him, or if he be found in his hand, he shall surely be put to death." Though this divine command was given to the people of Israel, it is moral, and proceeds upon the same principle with that prohibition in the decalogue, "Thou shalt not steal."

So Paul, with reference to this, says—"The law is not made for a righteous man, but for murderers of fathers, and murderers of mothers, for man-stealers, for liars, for perjured persons." Man-stealing is here classed with such crimes as are most detestable in the sight of God, and most odious in the sight of men, and most deserving of death by the sword of justice. Man-stealing must therefore be a moral evil of the most aggravated nature, in every age and in every nation. A sin not only against God, but against our neighbor. If he who steals a sheep, or robs on the highway, may be considered a pest to society, of what enormous villany must he be guilty who steals or robs a man of all his property, or which is the same thing, takes a man by violence from all his property. The crime of theft does not so much lie in using stolen property, as in depriving the right owner of the use and enjoyment of it. But slaveholding deprives the man of all his property, and from the liberty of ever possessing more, and has some circumstances of aggravation and horror peculiar to itself, as that of robbing wives from their husbands, and husbands from their wives, children from their parents, and separating children from one another. But although these near relatives should not be separated from one another, yet it implies all the criminality of robbery of the highest aggravation, because all natural relations which exist amongst slaves, with all relative duties, are at the disposal of the slave master, who is absolute lord over all these relations and relative duties; in consequence of which, every child that is born of a slave, even though it is suffered to live in the same house with its parents, is robbed from them; that is, the rights of all relative duties are by violence taken away and usurped by the master. But what is the most criminal of all is, that the slave master, by his last will, gives his posterity a charter to continue the practice of man-stealing, to perpetual generations.

Lev. xix. 13: "Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbor neither rob him; the wages of him that is hired shall not abide with thee until the morning." But slaveholding implies both fraud and robbery. It is a robbing our neighbor of his liberty, his time, and his labor. If to defraud an hireling of his wages is theft and robbery, how much rather is slaveholding, that not only robs a man of wages for his labor, but of his liberty, his children, and all his relatives of their right of duty to them, and the right of obedience from them ; and the worst of all is, a robbing them of that time which they ought to devote to the service of God ; so that the slave has no time to learn to know his duty to God, nor leisure to serve him, or to prepare for eternity.

Verse 33 : " And if a stranger sojourn with you in your land, ye shall not vex him ; but the stranger that dwelleth with you shall be unto you as one born among you, and thou shalt love him as thyself, for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." Strangers and sojourners among the Jews were all the heathen nations ; so that this text absolutely prohibited the Jews from enslaving the heathen who dwelt among them and enjoyed their protection, much more to enslave those heathen who were living within their own borders, and seeking no protection.

Ex. xxiii. 9 : " Thou shalt not oppress a stranger, for ye know the heart of a stranger, seeing ye were strangers in the land of Egypt." That oppressing strangers means enslaving them, is evident from the reference had to their bondage in Egypt ; so that this prohibits slavery among the Jews.

Levit. xxv. 35 : " If thy brother be waxen poor, and fall into decay with thee, thou shalt relieve him ; yea, though he be a stranger or sojourner, that he may live with thee." This is the very reverse of what is practised in slave states. Not only brethren of mankind, but brethren in Christian fellowship are enslaved ; that is, robbed of time, liberty, labor, and all the rights of men ; and whosoever will attempt to relieve them, must needs be fenced with iron, and the staff of a spear.

Jer. xxii. 13 : " Woe unto him that buildeth his house by unrighteousness, and his chambers by wrong ; that useth his neighbor's service without wages, and giveth him not for his work. This last is so directly pointed against unmerited, involuntary slavery, as to require no comment.

In the former part of this work it has been shown that slavery never was authorised among the Jews by the divine law, that although the law admitted of bond-men and bond-women, yet their bondage was so restricted as to prevent it from being intolerable. It has also been shown that it was confined to captives taken in war, to criminals and debtors; and we may now add, in connection with what has been said on the cause of the Gibeonites, that all public national servants, which the law of God allowed of among the Jews, were to be exclusively of the seven nations of Canaan, which God, by a special revelation of his will, consigned over to destruction for their atrocious wickedness. Deut. ii. 5, 9. 1 Kings, ix. 20, 22: "All the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites, which were not of the children of Israel, that were left after them in the land, whom the children of Israel also were not able utterly to destroy, upon these did King Solomon levy a tribute of bond-men unto this day. But of the children of Israel did Solomon make no bond-men, but they were men of war, and his servants, and his princes, and his captains, and rulers of his chariots, and his horsemen." Whence it appears that these bond-men were not contrasted with the natural rights of humanity, as in our slave states, but with military service and other honorable employments in the state. These bond-men, like the Gibeonites, were public national property, the same as enlisted soldiers, but not the private property of individuals; and as their bondage could not have been supposed to be intolerable, were liable to serve to the year of jubilee, except they became proselytes to the Jewish religion. But whatever institutions God gave to the Jews which bound them as his own peculiar people, to deal justly and mercifully to one another, are now equally binding upon the whole world; and all positive precepts which allowed the Jews to serve themselves by either the persons or property of any heathen nations, are now done away by the coming of Christ.

Eph. ii. 11: "Wherefore, remember that ye, being in time past Gentiles in the flesh, who are called uncircumcision by that which is called the circumcision in the flesh made by hands, that at that time ye were without Christ, being aliens from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenant of promise, having no hope, and without God in the world. But now in Christ Jesus, ye who some time were afar off, are now made nigh by the blood of Christ, for he is our peace who hath made both one, and hath broken down the middle wall of partition between us." Col. i. 20 : " And having made peace by the blood of his cross, by him to reconcile all things unto himself, by him I say, whether they be things in earth or things in heaven." From these passages it appears, that all the peculiarities of the Jewish dispensation are done away ; so that all moral precepts which forbade the Jews to oppress, enslave, or sell one another, are equally binding upon all mankind. As the Jews were called in Scripture language brethren, whether they were gracious persons or unbelievers, so under the gospel dispensation are all mankind on account of the Gentile nations enjoying the same privileges which aforetime were restricted to the Jews, to the exclusion of the Gentiles. All the Gentiles are said to be reconciled to God, because the middle wall of partition is taken down. In strict agreement with the Scriptures above cited, the words addressed to the Jews, will condemn our modern dealers in the souls and bodies of men.

Amos viii. 5, 6 : " Falsifying the balance by deceit, that ye may buy the poor for silver, and the needy for a pair of shoes." Chap. ii. 6 : " Thus saith the Lord, for three transgressions of Israel, and for four I will not turn away the punishment thereof, because they sold the righteous for silver, and the poor for a pair of shoes." Eccl. iv. 1. " So I returned and considered all the oppressions that are done under the sun, and behold the tears of such as were oppressed, and they had no comfort ; and on the side of their oppressors there was power, but they had no comforter. Wherefore I praised the dead which are already dead, more than the living who are yet alive." That these words were designed to display the miserable condition of persons in a state of abject slavery similar to what is practised in our slave states can hardly be called in question by any that will be at pains to compare his words with the condition of slaves. As

First.—These which he saw and considered were overwhelmed with grief and despair.

Secondly.—They were subject to unjust and arbitrary power, because those who had the rule over them he calls oppressors.

Thirdly.—They were in that condition as to be out of the reach of any ordinary means of relief, for on the side of their oppressors there was power.

Fourthly.—Their condition was so wretched that he praised the state of the dead in comparison with theirs. The whole is so completely descriptive of modern slavery, that had the inspired writer designed at the time to give a true delineation of the real condition of slaves in our slave states, he could not have done it with more exactness.

We shall now state some arguments from the New Testament. Matt. vii. 12: "Therefore all things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you do ye even so to them, for this is the law and the prophets." Chap. xxii. 37-40: "Jesus said unto him, Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the first and great commandment. And the second is like unto it, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself; on these two commandments hang all the law and the prophets." All men are our neighbors. To love our neighbors as ourselves is to study his interest as well as our own, and in no respect to sacrifice his welfare for the advancement of our own, but slaveholding can have no existence without sacrificing all the rights and privileges of the slave for the advantage of the master.

James v. 1, 6: "Go to now, ye rich men, weep and howl for the miseries that shall come upon you. Your riches are corrupted, and your garments are moth eaten, your gold and silver is cankered, and the rest of them shall be a witness against you, and shall eat your flesh as it were fire. Ye have heaped treasure together for the last day. Behold the hire of the laborers who have reaped down your fields which is of you kept back by fraud crieth, and the cries of them who have escaped are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabaoth." That the laborers here who are defrauded of their hire or just wages were slaves and not hirelings, is evident,

First.—Because slavery was then universal throughout the Roman empire, and the twelve tribes of Israel to whom the apostle addressed his epistle, were scattered abroad throughout the whole empire, which was then all the known world.

Secondly.—Keeping back the hire is spoken of as a general evil, which could not have been if the ground of complaint had been no more than that of rich men withholding stipulated wages from their laborers, because such a practice could not have been universal, while every hiring had the half of the bargain to make; and a general practice of defrauding hirelings would have prevented hiring altogether;—therefore these rich men must have been slave holders, and the laborers that reaped down their fields were slaves, whom they defrauded of their wages.

John viii. 35 : “And the servanta bideth not in the house forever, but the son abideth forever.” In these words Christ could not have meant to compare the local residence of a servant with that of a son, for it was a privilege granted to a son from the beginning, that he should leave his father and his mother and cleave unto his wife. Therefore Christ’s design in the illustration of his subject was, to compare the temporary relation of a servant to his master, with that of a son to his father, which is perpetual. The servant abideth. If perpetual hereditary slavery had been allowed among the Jews, the comparison would have been perfectly unnatural, so that this text is a plain proof that perpetual slavery had no existence in the Jewish nation.

Rev. xviii. 8–13 : In this chapter trafficking in slaves is pointed out as one criminal mark of the great whore of Babylon, where her articles of commerce are specified, some of which consisted of slaves and souls of men.

CHAPTER VI.

THE EXAMPLE OF CHRIST.

OBJECTION.—If slaveholding is criminal, why did not Christ preach up the emancipation of slaves?

ANSWER.—Christ did testify against slavery in the very first sermon he delivered, where he publicly announced his mediatorial office. Luke iv. 18. His subject was from Isaiah, chapter 1 :—“The spirit of the Lord God is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he has sent me to heal the broken hearted, to preach deliverance to the captives, and recovering sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord." These expressions, broken hearted, blind, bruised, are figurative of the different kinds and degrees of misery in which mankind are involved by sin, from which they need deliverance through a mediator; but these strong figures are not taken from those kinds of miseries or punishments under which persons are lawfully held for their crimes. It is in every instance unlawful to relieve the guilty from deserved punishment, but those figures are taken from miseries in which persons are unjustly held by cruel tyranny, and certain it is that no people are subject to so hopeless and so unjust a captivity as those that are detained in a state of unmerited slavery, none kept in greater blindness, none more subject to be beaten, bruised and murdered. As Christ then, by the use and application of these figures, shews what was the great object of his mission into the world at a time when slavery was universal throughout the Roman empire, while two thirds of the population were slaves, we may conclude that one branch of his mediatorial office, was the emancipation of mankind from civil and political bondage, as well as spiritual. Had Christ made choice of a number of figures taken from those civil punishments under which criminals are justly held, it would have conveyed an idea that he came to destroy the law rather than to fulfil it. Man's punishment for sin is just in relation to God, but in many instances mankind are subject to unjust punishment in relation to one another. Christ's office as mediator was to fulfil the law, to deliver sinners from condemnation in relation to God's law, and from unjust punishment in relation to men and the power of Satan: the design of the gospel is to proclaim to mankind, sinners' deliverance from the guilt of sin, and for freedom from spiritual bondage, and to enlighten the nations of the earth, as to bring about their freedom from civil and political bondage. That the end of Christ's office was thus extensive is more copiously expressed in the next verse: "To proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord." This expression relates to the great jubilee, which was a general release from all debts, mortgages and servirtudes. That a release from all these bonds was just, and to have detained persons under bonds longer than the year of jubilee, would have been unjust, is evident from these reasons.

First.—It was the command of God that such release should be.

Second.—All their contracts were made in accommodation to the year of jubilee.

Third.—The general release which was proclaimed in the jubilee was typical of the coming of Christ, whose office was to proclaim liberty to all that are in spiritual bondage, and to open a way for deliverance to all that are unjustly detained in temporal bondage. That this is the sense of the words, is manifest from the particular kind of freedom, which was implied in the jubilee; it was a freedom from servitude, so that no person could be detained in bondage longer than to that period. Every part of the typical service must have been founded upon moral justice, and in no respect contrary to it. A release from bondage in the year of jubilee was typical of that liberty which Christ came to proclaim, therefore it must have been just to release all servants from bondage in the year of jubilee, and to have detained them would have been unjust; that which was unjust in a moral point of view, under the Old Testament, is equally unjust under the New; for Christ came not to destroy the law. If the typical law secured the emancipation of all such as were held in bondage, the ante-type must do the same, for we cannot expect the ante-type to fall short of the type.

The proclamation of the jubilee under the Old Testament, was to the Jews, as the Gospel is to all nations under the New, the middle wall of partition being broken down by the coming of Christ; so that Christ in his public administrations established a foundation for the universal emancipation of slaves. Matth. vii. 12: "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do you even so to them." Christ and his apostles laid down the gospel before sinners as a ground of salvation, and also the preceptive obligations of the moral law as a rule of duty, explained it and enforced its authority, so as by necessary implication to condemn slaveholding, allowing their hearers to make an application of the general principles of moral justice to particular cases. But the condition of the Christian church is entirely different in the present age, and in this country from that of the apostolical age. The great end of the gospel in the apostolical age was not in the first instance to deliver mankind from corporeal bondage, and to restore them to the enjoyment of civil privileges, but to deliver them from the guilt and bondage of sin, which would prepare the way for deliverance from political bondage. In that age, all nations were under the Roman yoke. To have preached a universal emancipation of slaves in the apostolical age, would have been the same as to have attempted an overthrow of the empire ; but in the present age and in our nation, the preachers of the gospel are bound to address mankind in a manner adapted to their present condition as professed Christians and freemen, who are acquainted with God's law, and its obligations upon all men—to a people also, who are themselves the constituents of government, and have an active hand in making the constitution and all the laws of government. Men under the Roman government might have been either masters or slaves without criminality, while masters were bound to pay wages to their slaves, as will be afterwards shown. But it is impossible for men to hold persons in slavery under our government, without the grossest criminality, because the principles upon which we maintain our own liberty and independence, and the ground upon which we make laws to promote justice and equity between man and man, strike at the very root of slaveholding, and condemn it to the lowest hell.

CHAPTER VII.

OF THE DUTY OF A SLAVE TO HIS MASTER.

A slave while he remains with his master, owes obedience to him, and as long as he remains under his authority is bound to honor him, not because of any moral right that the master has to hold him in bondage but because of the benefits he receives from him. Although he is a despot, yet in virtue of the laws of the state, he is all the civil magistrate the slave has to protect him against dangers, and is his benefactor to feed and clothe him. For these reasons he is as much bound to obey and honor his master, as the subjects of any other tyrant are bound to obey and honor their tyrant while they enjoy his protection; and while Providence has presented no way of immediate relief, no essential difference can be found between the relation of a slave to his despotical master, and the relation of subjects to a despotical king. Agreeable to this view of the subject the Scripture required Christians to be subject to the Roman Emperor and his subordinate governors. 1 Peter, ii. 13: "Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the king as supreme, or unto governors as unto them that are sent by him for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well." The apostle continues his exhortation to some length, when he presently recognizes the duty of servants to masters. Verse 18: "Servants be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward," but he gives not the least insinuation of the Emperor's power over them being just, neither anything to recognize the authority of a froward master as lawful. So that the same natural right which the Roman subjects had to emancipate themselves from their despotical yoke, the servants of despotical masters have to emancipate themselves from their yoke, that is, when Divine providence presents a fair opportunity.

Slavery, virtue dreads it as her grave,
 Patience itself is meanness in a slave;
 Yet if the will and sovereignty of God,
 Bids suffer it awhile and kiss the rod,
 Wait for the dawning of a better day,
 And snap the chain the moment when you may.

1 Cor. vii. 21: "Art thou called, being a servant, care not for it; but if thou mayest be made free, use it rather; he that is called in the Lord, being a servant, is the Lord's free man." The word here translated servant, is doulos, which signifies either a slave or an hired servant. His saying, "If thou mayest be made free, use it rather," may apply to a hired servant whose worldly condition might require him to occupy the station of a servant. If it should be contended that the term in the original is applicable to a slave rather than to a hired servant, the apostle's admonition, "If thou mayest be made free use it rather," will go to condemn slaveholding. Because if it is just to retain a person in a state of slavery, that person has no power of choice, neither could it be his duty to attempt to be free, more than for a minor or an apprentice to attempt to obtain freedom from his lawful guardian or master; but if this or any other apostolical admonition relative to servants should be so construed as to require slaves to obey their masters, it can mean no other than a patient submission to an unlawful yoke, while they could have no prospect of immediate relief.

Eph. vi. 5—9: "Servants be obedient to them that are your masters according to the flesh; not with eye service as men pleasers, but as the servants of Christ, doing the will of God from the heart with good will, doing service as unto the Lord, and not to men; knowing that whatsoever good any man doeth, the same shall he receive of the Lord, whether he be bond or free." The original word translated servants is douloi, which will signify either slaves or voluntary servants, as appears from the very next verse where the same word is used to express the condition of true believers who are called the doulos, the servants of Christ. It would sound rather harsh to call believers the slaves of Christ; that the term may signify either slaves or voluntary servants is evident from the promiscuous use of it in the Scriptures, where it is often applied to hired servants, as in Luke xv. 22; Matth. xiii. 27, 28; xviii. 23, 28. That the word here means voluntary servants, is further evident from the duties enjoined upon masters. Eph. vi. 9: "And ye masters do the same things unto them forbearing threatening, knowing that your master is in heaven. Neither is there respect of persons with him." Three things are inculcated in these words. The first is, the duty of paying wages to servants after he had directed servants to be faithful in serving their masters, he immediately directs masters to do the same things unto them, which cannot mean the same forms of service, but it must imply just and equitable returns to them for their service, or equitable wages. A second thing inculcated in these words, is, that masters should forbear threatening, which may be done in the government of hirelings, but not in that of slavery. The third thing is, impartiality in their behavior towards them, signified by the last clause of the verse—"Neither is there respect of persons with him." But to hold men in a state of unmerited bondage, is the utmost extreme of partiality.

That all apostolical directions to servants to be obedient to their masters respected voluntary servants, and not slaves, is manifest from one special reason. That is, that in general, where obedience to masters is enjoined upon servants, obedience in children to their parents is also enjoined, which shews that the servants specified in those injunctions were voluntary servants, and not slaves, for if all children without exception are bound by command of God, to obey their parents, and all parents are in duty bound to instruct and govern their families, it is impossible that the authority of the slaveholder can be lawful, when it of necessity contravenes the authority of the slave parents to command, and the power of the slave children to obey. That the reader may perceive the force of this argument, let him read the verses which precede the words we have had under consideration. Col. iii. 22 : "Servants obey in all things your masters according to the flesh, not with eye service as men pleasers, but in singleness of heart, fearing God. And whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as to the Lord, and not unto men, knowing that of the Lord ye shall receive the reward of the inheritance, for ye serve the Lord Christ." That these directions have a strict relation to the common servants and not to slaves, is evident from his classing the duties of servants with the natural duties of husbands and wives, parents and children. That command which binds children to obey their parents in all things as a duty well-pleasing in the sight of the Lord is incompatible with slavery; therefore the words in the 22d verse cannot have a respect to slaves, without contradicting the obligations laid upon parents and children in the preceding verses. That the apostle's injunction refers to voluntary servants and not to slaves, is further evident from his injunction upon masters in the beginning of the next chapter. Verse 1: "Masters give unto your servants that which is just and equal, knowing that you have a master in heaven." Masters are here commanded to give unto their servants that which is just; that is, a reward for their labor; and equal, which requires the wages to be proportionate to their labor. If these servants were even slaves, and rendered incapable by the Roman laws of being made free, this command would have bound the masters to pay them wages equal to their labor.

1 Tim. vi. 1: "Let as many servants as are under the yoke, count their own masters worthy of all honor, that the name of God and his doctrine be not blasphemed; and they that have believing masters let them not despise them, because they are brethren, but rather do them service, because they are faithful and beloved, partakers of the benefit." The expression, servants under the yoke, may signify hired servants, or any persons that are under any bond or obligation to serve others; yet considering that slavery in the apostle's time was universal throughout the world, the duties inculcated in the text, may relate to slaves, without contradicting anything that has been advanced against the practice of slaveholding. This will appear from two general reasons. The first is that all the subjects of the Roman empire were in a manner slaves, their lives and property so completely under the power of the emperor and other subordinate tyrants that none were free; so that the state of common slaves could have hardly been worse than that of their masters.

Secondly.—The apostle knew well the obstacles which would have prevented a general emancipation of slaves, to wit, the Roman law. He also knew that few masters would be disposed to keep slaves, pay them wages, and be responsible for their conduct, longer than the laws of the empire would admit of their freedom. Therefore, he more immediately enjoined upon Christians the duty of paying them just and equitable wages, than to liberate them, in direct contradiction to the laws of government. The reason which is added to excite servants to be obedient to their believing masters, is properly opposed to slavery, because they are faithful; which intimates faithfulness in paying them wages, as well as beloved for their humane treatment, and partakers of the benefit, that is, of the profits arising from their labor. A servant that receives wages may be faithful and diligent in his master's service, and the benefits redounding to his master from his labor may be a motive of encouragement to greater diligence and faithfulness; but we can hardly expect that a person who receives no compensation for his labor, can view the prosperity of his master, and the profits arising from his labor as motives of encouragement.

What Paul writes to Philemon respecting Onesimus, is so far from countenancing slavery, as some would have it, that it operates against it. That Onesimus was a servant of Philemon, was evident; but whether he was a hireling, a servant for debt, or a minor, is not said. That he could not be a slave, is manifest from Paul's speaking of him as being then free from any obligation to be subject to Philemon in the character of a servant, and admonishes him to receive him, not as a servant, but as a son. If it is a moral duty to keep men in a state of slavery, a slave becoming a convert to Christianity cannot lay the master under an obligation to set him free, more than a minor or son, professing Christianity, will loose him from his obligation to serve and obey his father. Gal. iv. 1: "The heir, as long as he is a child, differeth nothing from a servant." If it is true, that a master must emancipate his slave upon his professing Christianity, while previous to that, the moral law made it his duty to keep him in perpetual bondage, it will suppose that Christ came to destroy the law, or which is the same thing, to loose men from its obligation. Phil. 18: "If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on mine account." The insinuation, if he hath wronged thee, is a plain intimation that Paul did not consider him as a slave who had departed from his master; for if Philemon had held him as his lawful slave, his departure could be no matter of hesitation whether he had wronged him by running away ; therefore, when Paul said, " If he hath wronged thee," he insinuates that there might have been some part of his time that, as a servant, he had not fulfilled. " If he oweth thee aught." This is another insinuation that he could not be a slave, for slaves are not apt to owe sums of money to their masters. His saying, " Put that on mine account," is a further evidence that Onesimus was not a slave, for we have no reason to think that Paul, who was then a prisoner, could have wherewith to purchase his freedom.

CHAPTER IX.

ARGUMENTS IN FAVOR OF SLAVERY.

The arguments in favor of slavery are mostly drawn from four resources.

First.—From the Scriptural accounts we have of bondmen and bond maids, servants under the yoke, and the obedience which is so strictly and repeatedly enjoined upon them. All this no person denies, but it in no respect affects the matter in dispute. It is involuntary, unmerited, hereditary slavery which we condemn, and which no Scripture will justify, as has already been shown ; and further, if slavery had never been practised in the world since the creation, all these texts which enjoin the duties of servants to their masters, could have their full and direct application to minor servants and hirelings, to such as might be subject to bondage for their crimes or for debt. Then, can any one of them be taken for a vindication of slavery ?

Secondly.—Some plead for slavery from the decrees of God and his foreknowledge. But to attempt to prove any doctrine or practice on that principle, would justify the Jews in crucifying Jesus Christ. The moral law is our rule of duty, and not any thing pertaining to the secret will or foreknowledge of God.

Thirdly.—Some plead for slavery from Noah's curse pronounced upon the posterity of Ham, but it is not unfavorable to the cause of freedom that the prophetic curse was denounced against Canaan only; and it is evident from the best authorities, that neither he nor his posterity settled in Africa. It is also a fact that African slavery only commenced between two and three centuries ago. But suppose African slavery was an accomplishment of that prophetic curse, it will no more justify the agency of men in the fulfilment of the prediction, than God's denunciation of vengeance on the Jews would justify the King of Babylon in executing that threatening.

Fourthly.—Slaveholding is justified by some on the ground of Christian experience. The argument runs thus. We hope we have been convinced of sin, and have obtained forgiveness through Jesus Christ; and amidst all our convictions, we never saw that slaveholding was a sin. Therefore we cannot think it wrong to retain them in bondage, provided we use them well. But such as use this argument in favor of slavery show that they have never been either truly convinced or converted, because all such take their own feelings and inward frames for their rule of duty, which none can do without undervaluing the word of God. Isaiah viii. 20: "To the law and to the testimony: if they speak not according to this word, it is because there is no light in them."

2. There are many who have been convinced of sin, and shown hopeful signs of forgiveness, gone far in religion, stood long, professed great zeal, acquired much knowledge, been in high esteem among Christians, and done much for the church of Christ, with whom the work of conversion never was genuine; so that this argument is destitute of moral right.

OBJECTION.—If a general emancipation of the slaves was to take place, intermarriages between the whites and the blacks would be an unavoidable consequence.

ANSWER.—It is granted this might be the consequence, yet it would be much better that it should be so than worse. As matters now stand, a mixture of color is rapidly increasing by means of illicit embraces, much more than could be expected by lawful marriages, if they were all free and independent, for which two reasons may be assigned. The first is, that if they were free they would be liable to improve by means of religious and moral instruction, as well as the white population ; which would have the same tendency to prevent irregular practices. A second reason is, that if they were all free and independent, they would be no longer subject to the lawless power of despotical masters, who can, without restraint, compel their female slaves to become their prostitutes when they please. The force of this argument is evinced by facts. The city of Philadelphia in Pennsylvania, contains about 20,000 free blacks ; yet the mixture of color, as to numbers, bears no proportion to that in slave states.

CHAPTER X.

OF THE REAL CONDITION OF SLAVEHOLDERS IN RELATION TO THE JUSTICE OF GOD.

It has been shown that involuntary, unmerited, hereditary slavery, has nothing to justify it in the Scripture, but is condemned by both the Old and New Testaments. That it is so directly contrary to the moral law, and the natural rights of man, as to embrace twenty-nine points of the grossest criminality. If, then, any one sin persisted in, without repentance, will expose the sinner to the Divine displeasure, and subject him to the vengeance of eternal fire, what shall we say of a practice which involves in it all the abominations condemned by the moral law ; so that whatsoever is most dishonorable to God, and destructive to the souls of men, is a most prominent feature in the practice of slaveholding ; therefore, except the character of God should change, the moral law be destroyed, and those Scriptures become untrue which testify that except we cut off right hand sins, and pluck out right eye sins, we cannot enter the kingdom of God. It is impossible that a person living and dying in the practice of slaveholding can enter that kingdom, but must, according to the Scripture, be consigned over to that region from which there is no redemption ; and all those who are implicated in that sin, and persist in the practice, are now treasuring up wrath against the day of wrath, and just judgment of ungodly men.

It has been shown that slaveholders are most flagrant breakers of all the ten commandments ; in particular, that every individual of that class, by virtue of his office and station, independent of his treatment of the slaves, usurps the place of God, and even exalts himself above him, by contravening the authority of his law in relation to his slaves. He has authority to intercept and prevent all the duties which the slave owes to God, to which God has a prior right, and to intercept all the duties which the slave-parents and their children reciprocally owe to one another ; that it implies a power of separating those whom God has joined together ; that it implies the highest possible degrees of theft and robbery, the sin of perjury, with a violation of all other precepts of the moral law. Therefore, the curse of God, denounced against all his incorrigible enemies, must fall upon them at that tribunal, where every one shall receive a reward according to the deeds done in the body. He shall have judgment without mercy, who sheweth no mercy. Zech. v. 2, 3 : " And he said unto me, what seest thou. And I answered, I see a flying roll ; the length is twenty cubits, and the breadth thereof ten cubits. Then said he unto me, this is the curse that goeth over the face of the whole earth, for every one that stealeth shall be cut off as on this side according to it ; and every one that sweareth falsely shall be cut off as on that side. And I will bring it forth, saith the Lord of hosts, and it shall enter into the house of the thief, and into the house of him that sweareth falsely by mine name ; and it shall remain in the midst of his house, and shall consume it, with the timber thereof, and the stones thereof." Mal. iii. 5 : " And I will come near to you to judgment, and I will be a swift witness against the sorcerers, and against the adulterers, and against false swearers, and against those that oppress the hireling in his wages, the widow and the fatherless, and that turn aside the stranger from his right, and fear not me, saith the Lord of hosts."

" Is there not some chosen curse,
Some hidden thunder in the stores of heaven,
Red with uncommon wrath to blast the man,
Who gains his fortune from the blood of souls."

CHAPTER XL

OF THE DUTY OF CHRISTIANS RELATIVE TO SLAVERY.

First.—Christians, in a religious point of view, ought to have no church fellowship with slaveholders. 2 Cor. vi. 14, 18: "Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers; for what fellowship hath righteousness with unrighteousness, and what communion hath light with darkness, and what concord hath Christ with Belial, or what part hath he that believeth with an infidel? Wherefore, come out from among them, and be ye separate, saith the Lord, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you." But,

Secondly.—To consider the duty of Christians in a civil point of view. The practice of slaveholding in a slave state need not deter emancipators or others from the privilege of voting for candidates to the legislative bodies, or from using their best endeavors to have men placed in office that will be favorable to the cause of freedom, and who may be best qualified to govern the state or commonwealth; but it ought to prevent any from officiating as a magistrate, when his commission authorizes him to issue a warrant to apprehend the slave when he is guilty of no other crime than that of running away from unmerited bondage.

If it is a transgression of the moral law to keep men in unmerited bondage, while they have no protection from the civil law, to secure to them their other natural rights, it is a great duty in the slaves to make their escape as soon as Divine providence gives them an opportunity. On this ground it is impossible for any one to hinder or prevent their escape, without flying in the face of the moral law. It is impossible for the moral law to make it duty in the slave to escape, and the duty of a magistrate to prevent his escape; it would suppose the moral law to be at war with itself. It can be no just apology for a magistrate in that case that he is bound by his oath to do it, because no human obligation, whether by the civil law, oath, or promise, can make it duty for any one to transgress the moral law. If a commission from government, and an oath of office will make it duty in any one instance to transgress the moral law, it might, on the same principle, make it a duty for the son to kill his father, though perfectly innocent; or curse, swear, or blaspheme the name of God, or to fall down and worship a golden image.

Thirdly.—The practice of slaveholding being protected by the laws of the commonwealth, will prevent any one, who has the fear of God before his eyes, from acting as a sheriff or constable in apprehending a runaway slave, and prevent all conscientious persons from obeying the command of either squire, sheriff, or constable, or any other officer of government who might demand assistance to apprehend a runaway slave, except he was guilty of some other crime.

Fourthly.—It will condemn the business of advertising, or assisting in setting up advertisements for the purpose of apprehending runaway negroes, or to take them up, either for a reward, or without it.

If the people of Israel, under the Old Testament, who had no slaves of that description we have under consideration, were prohibited from taking up a servant who had escaped from his master, how much more aggravating must the sin and cruelty be, of taking up an innocent person, who has only attempted to enjoy his natural and lawful rights, by escaping from his master, who exercised a lawless power over him, and had no right, by the law of God, to detain him one hour. That the people of Israel were prohibited by divine authority from taking up and delivering a servant to his master, is proved from Deut. xxiii. 15, 16; Prov. xxx. 10.

Fifthly.—It will condemn the practice of hiring slaves from their masters. In that case, the master delegates his power over the slave to the employer for the time specified; the employer is then the master's representative, and has the same power to compel the slave to labor, and to restrain him from his natural rights, as the master had, and is for the time agreed upon, his real master; therefore, his authority over the slave must be as really criminal as the master's, or as that of an officer of a persecuting tyrant, who executes the laws of his despotal sovereign upon the persons of those who risk their lives and fortunes for the cause of God.

Sixthly.—According to the laws of slave states, it would be impossible for men to act as jurors, consistent with duty in a case depending between a master and his slave, if the crime was no other than that of the slave quitting his master's service. In such a trial the juror is bound to bring in a true verdict according to law and evidence. The law there meant is that relating to slaves, but no jury in such a case could determine the cause in favor of the master, without contradicting the moral law. They could not decide it in favor of the slave without incurring the guilt of perjury. The case would be entirely different, if the laws of slave states would protect the slaves in the enjoyment of all their natural rights, with the exception of their labor only. The jury might then determine the cause in favor of the master, because all the evil to which the slave would be subject, would be of a penal nature; but when we consider that the slaves have no protection while they live from either law or government, but are completely outlawed, and exposed to the most cruel insults without redress, wives and daughters subject to the will of their lascivious masters, without the privilege of a legal complaint, and their posterity, to perpetual generations, placed in the same horrible condition. It appears self-evident that they are not only in duty bound to embrace the first favorable opportunity to escape from their tyrants, but it would be criminal to neglect it, so that no jury could decide such a cause against the slave without contracting great guilt and incurring damnation.

Seventhly.—Should the slaves in a slave state rise in rebellion against their tyrants for the cause of liberty, the free inhabitants of that state would be as much forbidden by the moral law to take up arms to suppress that insurrection, as they are forbidden to assault and murder any of their innocent neighbors and all such as might actually fight in such a cause, in open hostility to moral justice and the rights of man, would be real murderers; and should any thus engaged in such a contest against the innocent be slain, they must inevitably sink to the bottomless pit; for, says the Scripture, no murderer has eternal life.

For the reasons now laid down, it appears that all opposers of slavery residing in slave states, who have come to a full conviction of the God-dishonoring and hell-deserving nature of slaveholding, and are conscious of the sinful entanglements to which they are liable while residing in such a situation, together with the dangers to which they or their posterity must eventually be exposed, ought to make speedy arrangements to withdraw from the tents of those wicked men, by removing to some free state, lest they be partakers of their sins, and become sharers of their plagues.

Should a slave state, in imminent danger of being overcome by an insurrection of the slaves, call upon a neighboring state for assistance, in either men, money, arms, ammunition or provisions, for the purpose of suppressing the slaves, no part of that assistance could be granted without contracting blood-guiltiness, nor without calling down the judgments of God upon the nation; and all such as might fall, when fighting in the defence of a cause, that could not even have the color of justice, might be expected to spend an eternity in chains and darkness, with no better company than that of slaveholders. If the Legislature of any free state should pass a law to raise troops to assist in suppressing the slaves of a slave state, when engaged in fighting for their natural rights, the citizens ought as absolutely to refuse either to take arms to fight in such a cause, or to hire substitutes, as the troops of King Saul rejected his authority, when he commanded them to slay the priests of the Lord. The command of even a lawful government cannot make it lawful for the subjects to go to war except the cause is just; if it is unjust, obedience is murder, and open rebellion against God, whose law condemns murderers under pain of death.

QUERY.—Could a slave state, by virtue of the Federal Constitution have a legal claim upon the Federal Government for assistance to suppress an insurrection of the slaves?

ANSWER.—No slave state could have any legal claim on the Federal Government for assistance to suppress an insurrection of the slaves; because slavery is directly contrary to the Federal Constitution ; and those laws of state legislatures which ratify slavery are unconstitutional laws. The Federal Constitution declares that all men are created free, and have equal rights ; therefore the Federal Government might refuse to grant the smallest assistance. They might reject a demand of this sort on the same principle that our federal courts refuse to determine causes in conformity to an unconstitutional law. That law which sanctions slavery, is not only unjust, but unconstitutional, and every attempt to suppress an insurrection of the slaves has for its object the support of an unconstitutional practice, and all attempts to help slaveholders to keep their slaves in subjection are opposed to the moral law, and to the Federal Constitution.

When it is here asserted that the Federal Constitution condemns slavery, it is not to be understood that that instrument, in its present form, contains an explicit reprehension of slavery, but it means that the foundation and ground work of the Constitution condemns the practice in the most clear and explicit form. See Declaration of Independence, page 1st : " We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal ; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness—that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed ; that whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it, and to constitute a new government most likely to effect their safety and happiness." In the same declaration the very same reasons which are laid down to justify the independence of America, would form a juster plea for the slaves of any country to take the same measures to emancipate themselves from bondage, which the American people did to obtain their independence. In the close of this declaration, the Congress who justly style themselves the representatives of the people, bind themselves in all their future proceedings to act agreeable to these equal rights, which are here asserted. Page 7. " And for the support of this declaration, with a firm reliance on the protection of Divine providence, we mutually pledge to each other, our lives, our fortunes, and our sacred honors."

Signed by order of the Congress,

JOHN HANCOCK, President.

CHARLES THOMPSON, Secretary.

That this Declaration of Independence was the foundation of the Federal Constitution, is manifest,

First.—Because the members of Congress, informing the Declaration of Independence, acted as representatives of the nation.

Second.—The Declaration of Independence exhibited the moral ground on which the nation could justify herself in acting as a political body, independent of Great Britain.

Third.—The equal rights which the nation by her representatives, had then bound herself to maintain and defend, being secured, was an encouragement to the people not only to prosecute the war with firmness, but to expect that any future form of constitution which might be adopted, would correspond with the principles of equal rights established in the Declaration of Independence.

It appears that the Declaration of Independence was the only federal constitution that existed in the United States until the articles of confederation were ratified, July 9, 1779, the third year of independence, which articles perfectly correspond with the Declaration of Independence relative to the rights of men. That instrument of confederation, now called the Federal Constitution, was not ratified until the twelfth year of American independence. It is so far from differing from the Declaration of Independence, that slavery is not once named in any of its articles. In section 9, it is said—"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the states now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to 1803"—but whether the persons so imported were allowed to be convicts, redemptioners, or any other voluntary servants, is not said; but one thing is certain, they are not called slaves, neither could the migration of slaves be tolerated by the Constitution in any way consistent with the Declaration of Independence, which was its foundation. Suppose that clause should be so construed as to tolerate the importation of servants under bonds for debt, or redemptioners, it will not authorise the importation of slaves, to be subject to unmerited, hereditary slavery.

Under article 4, section 2, it is said—"No person held to service or labor in any state under the laws thereof, escaping into another, shall in consequence of any law or regulation therein be discharged from such service or labor, but shall be delivered upon the claim of the party to whom such service or labor may be due." The design of this section was to protect the legislative authorities of all the individual states over their respective subjects, by preventing any one state from making laws relative to servants, which might prevent the free operation of the laws of any other state, and allow to each government a right and power of determining all causes in which its own people were peculiarly implicated. This section by no means recognizes the practice of holding men in a state of unmerited bondage, as being morally just, yet it seems to imply a kind of timid recognition of slavery as being politically right. If slaveholding is morally wrong, agreeable to the Declaration of Independence, it cannot be morally right for one state to deliver up the fugitive slaves of another, to be again subject to unjust bondage.

Secondly.—Can a gospel minister faithfully discharge his duty without testifying against slavery?

Answer.—It is impossible for a gospel minister to discharge his official duty in its full extent without pointing out the whole duty of man, and reprobating every thing that is dishonoring to God, and ruinous to the souls of men. Therefore, in order to discharge his duty to God, and also to acquit his own conscience, he is bound both in public and in private to testify against slavery. A minister's duty is not only to preach to sinners deliverance from eternal condemnation, but also to show the necessity of salvation from the habit and practice of sin, without which no one can enter the kingdom of God, and in particular to testify against the practice of slaveholding, as well as against every other flagrant violation of the moral law; neither is there any other method so likely to bring about general emancipation of the slaves. Had all denominations of Christians in our nation, proceeded in this way, at the commencement of American independence, and continued their faithful exertions until this time, there would have been no occasion in our day for that disagreeable distinction in the American republic, of free states and slave states.

Secondly.—There is a time which calls forth the honest exertions of an ambassador of Christ, in dealing with the minds and consciences of men, more loudly than any other season; that is, when a slaveholder is about to take his departure from time, and appear before the tribunal of God, when a minister is called upon to visit such a person, in that solemn crisis, his indispensable duty is to deal honestly with him, and like a skilful physician to probe his wounds to the bottom; he ought to treat him with the same heroic boldness as Eli did Ahab, or that prophet who faithfully reproved king Ahab for his gross idolatry. With peculiar energy he ought to lay before him the unparalleled aggravation of the crime of slaveholding, his absolute need of faith, repentance, and reformation, without which he cannot expect to enter the kingdom of God. That instead of departing out of time, by entailing unmerited, hereditary bondage upon his neighbors, he is bound by the law and the prophets to love them as himself, and show forth his love by setting them at liberty. He may lay before him the vast extent of the Divine law, its spirituality and holiness, and direct him to compare these with his own heart and life, and in particular his keeping his fellow creatures in bondage, without giving them what is just and equal according to their labor, together with the other evils which are necessarily attached to slavery, but especially to show him the inconceivable wretchedness that soul must experience in the eternal world, that has departed this life with not only the aggravations of guilt, which are common to human life, but in the commission of a crime, which grants a charter to his own posterity to continue in the perpetration of the same to the end of the world, while it entails bondage and wretchedness upon the present generation of slaves, and also upon their posterity to the end of time. He may show them that if transient acts of wickedness will subject a sinner to the vengeance of hell-fire, how inconceivably dreadful must the condition be of that man, who in his expiring moments, commits a crime that lives in its effects and actual operation, by an arithmetical progression with his own posterity to the day of judgment, and in its bitter consequences upon the slaves to the same period. He may show him also that the sin of ratifying those dreadful entailments has one peculiar trait, which will prodigiously augment its criminality, that is the easy and ready way of getting rid of both the sin and the punishment which is the insertion of one item in his last will that will liberate all his slaves ; this itself cuts off the possibility of hereditary sinning from his own posterity to the end of the world, and hereditary bondage from the blacks to the end of the world.

Sin committed is liable to be more or less aggravating in proportion to the easiness of the opposite duty required, as well as by the enormity of the effects liable to be produced by the sin. And that man who is faithfully instructed and made acquainted with the easiness of performing a duty of so high importance as that of liberating his slaves, and thereby preventing his own posterity from a course of hereditary sinning, and the slaves from hereditary misery, and will deliberately leave the world with those shocking entailments upon both, ought to go into perdition ; neither can any ordinary berth in that region of despair, be adapted to his enormous guilt.

With what peculiar emphasis then, might the poet have applied these lines to the future condition of a slaveholder :

Unheard of tortures are reserved for such :

These herd together, the common damn'd shun their society.

Looking on themselves as fiends less foul.

BLAIR.

SOLILOQUY FOR A DYING SLAVEHOLDER.

I am now in a little time to appear in the presence of the great God, to give an account of all the actions of my life, and to be rewarded according to my works. If my works are those of faith in the merits of Christ, for my justification, and for my deliverance from the habit and practice of sin, and if I love God and my neighbor as myself, I shall receive a crown of glory as a reward of grace. But if I am found by the great Judge, to be wanting in faith and love to God, and of that love to my neighbor which would lead me to do for him what I would that he should do to me, I may expect, in a short time, to lift mine eyes in hell. All my black people are my neighbors; I must dispose of them in some form, that will be liable to fix their destiny in this world, after I shall have begun to experience the realities of eternity. I must either set them at liberty, or else rivet the chains of hereditary slavery upon them. How shall I dispose of them in a way conformable to that precept—"Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"? I am in a great strait; my mind, now on the brink of eternity, reels to and fro. If I depart this life with any one prevailing lust unmortified, I must perish for ever; for the divine word shews that except I cut off right-hand sins, and pluck out right-eye sins, I cannot enter the kingdom of God.

A very weighty business now lies before me. Whether I shall, in my last will, leave those my domestics bond or free. Leaving them bound will empower my own posterity to retain them in bondage for ever; this will imply a charter to all generations, to be doing either good or evil; one of the two it must be. These blacks must also be subject to hereditary slavery with its complicated horrors to the end of time, and these miseries must be extended to all branches of their posterity, though they should amount to millions.

Their gross ignorance will be liable to prevent them from a knowledge of the gospel, and obstruct their salvation. If I should set them at liberty it would tend to unlock the bars of ignorance, which lie in their way to happiness, both temporal and eternal, and cut off all the miseries of slavery from them and their posterity for ever. But should I set them at liberty, it may, in a measure, reduce my widow and fatherless children to want. When I take a serious view of the station I at this moment occupy in the moral world, I tremble at myself. My responsibility to God relative to my slaves, is truly awful. I now possess a power above the control of all men, by one act, to prevent my own posterity, to the end of the world, from enslaving them and their children. By the same act I can secure liberty to these slaves and their posterity for ever, and therewith prevent all the miseries of slavery. All these wonderful effects, which are of infinite importance,

I can instantly accomplish by having one item inserted in my last will, to liberate the slaves I now possess, and this will secure freedom to all their succeeding generations; on the contrary, I possess a power, independent of all men, to give to my posterity a charter to continue them in slavery, with all its horrors, to the end of time. I can, without being accountable to men, decide this great and important cause as I will; yet in whatever way I determine the matter, I must be accountable to God for it. Let me summon all my deliberative faculties in this portentous crisis, and come to a final determination. Can I now appeal to God, with all the solemnity of an oath, as I shall in a few hours answer to him, that I believe it to be my indispensable duty to rivet the chains of unmerited hereditary slavery, with all its concomitant miseries, upon these my fellow creatures and neighbors, to the end of time, and empower my children, and their children's children, to be executors of that deed. And can I, in consequence of this important transaction, look forward with a well grounded hope of receiving a gracious congratulation relative to this deed—"Well done, good and faithful servant, enter into the joy of thy Lord?" I cannot; it is impossible. Let me then commit my wife and children to the care and protection of a merciful God, who has promised to be the orphan's stay, and the widow's judge; for it is better for them to fall into the hands of the Lord, than into the hands of slaves. I will now, while in the land of the living and place of repentance, set them all at liberty, and at once open a way for the deliverance of them and their posterity from ignorance and wretchedness, to the end of the world, and prevent my own posterity, for ever, from exercising tyranny over them: so help me God.

The affecting scene of a dying slaveholder, bequeathing his estate to his heirs, is so well represented by a judicious writer on the subject of slavery, that we shall transcribe his statement verbatim. To see a man, (a Christian,) in the most serious part of his life, making his last will and testament, and in the most solemn manner addressing the judge of all the earth—"In the name of God, Amen."

Hearken to him; he certainly must be in earnest. He is closing all his concerns here below. He will very shortly appear before the Judge, where kings and slaves will have equal thrones.

He proceeds--

Item. I give and bequeath to my son a negro man, named a negro woman, named with five of her young children.

Item. I give and bequeath to my daughter a negro man, named also a negro woman named with her three children.

Item. All my other slaves, whether men, women, or children, with all my stock of horses, cattle, sheep, and hogs, I direct to be sold to the highest bidder, and the monies arising therefrom, (after paying my just debts,) to be equally divided between my two above named children.

Suppose, for a moment, that the testator, or if the owner dies intestate, (which is often the case,) was ever so humane a person, who can vouch for his heirs and successors? This consideration, if nothing else, ought to make all slaveholders take heed what they do, for they must give an account of themselves to God. BARROW.

CHAPTER XII.

PRACTICAL IMPROVEMENT.

The reader will perceive that the present work is not a sermon; yet, as the general subject is of a most serious nature, so as deeply to concern the eternal states of men, it may not be amiss to conclude with a practical improvement.

I. From what has been said of the real character of a slaveholder—how his authority over his slaves contravenes the authority of God's law relative to the slaves, and intercepts and prevents all relative duties between husbands and wives, parents and children, and turns the entire system of obedience due from the slaves, both to God and man, into a channel of honor and profit to himself—it appears that SLAVEHOLDER, considered as a term expressive of his station, office, and usurped authority, is a name of blasphemy, and, like that of the Devil, ought not to be mentioned but with horror, and when imperious necessity requires it.

II. From the view that has been taken of the enormous criminality of slaveholding, let no one rashly conclude, that, in the great scale of providential events, it is so far a nuisance in the moral world, as to answer no good purpose; for, upon mature consideration, it will be found to answer some valuable ends, both to display the justice of God, and to elucidate some of the other great doctrines of Divine revelation.

In the whole volume of Divine providence, there is no one thing which shows the absolute necessity of a hell, more than the practice of involuntary, unmerited, hereditary slavery. This will appear,

First—From the aggravation of the crime. The peculiar aggravation of the crime lies, not so much in hard treatment of the slaves, as in the station, office, and power of the slaveholder; all of which he voluntarily usurps, and entails hereditary bondage upon the slaves to the end of the world. The slaveholder may withhold a due allowance of food and clothing; but facts of this kind are only transient evils. He may abuse them by stripes, bruises, and maiming; but all these are transient acts of injustice. But to hold men in a state of slavery, and entail it upon them and their posterity to the end of the world, if he was to treat him ever so well in his own time, is that in which the most deadly criminality lies. The effects of transient acts of injustice are liable to be transient; but this lives, in its tremendous effects, long after the slaveholder is dead. So that if the wisdom of angels was employed for ages, in search of epithets to depict the shocking nature of that sin, they would come far short of their object; yea, if they were to range heaven, earth, and hell for metaphors, tropes, and figures, to express its multifarious horrors, they must still fall short. It would be like an attempt to measure eternity by an addition of finite periods; therefore, the peculiar aggravation of the crime is an evidence of the certainty of a hell.

Secondly—Agreeable to the laws of every slave state the owners of slaves are in no respect (with a very few exceptions) amenable to any human laws for their conduct towards their slaves ; but may rob them of their liberty, their children, their wages, may beat and abuse them at pleasure, and trample upon all their natural rights and natural relations, and, by their authority, supersede all moral obligations arising from these relations, and, in their last will, entail all that complication of miseries upon their posterity to perpetual generations. Therefore, when we look upon slaveholding as an assemblage of all the most capital outrages upon moral justice that can come under our inspection, and consider that the conduct of those tyrants, throughout the whole, is entirely out of the reach of justice in this world, it is a most striking and conspicuous evidence of the certainty of a hell, that slaveholders and all such as escape the justice of God administered by man in this world may meet with a due reward from the hand of God in the world to come.

Thirdly—Slaveholding is an amplification of the Scriptural doctrine of the fall of man. For when we take a view of the monstrous injustice, cruelty, and the abuse of every moral relation subsisting in the human family, implied in the practice, and all in open hostility to the very light of nature, as well as divine revelation, we may at once conclude, that this cannot be man's primitive state, as he came from the hands of a holy God. But man's nature is depraved, and the state of bondage and wretchedness in which the slaves are placed correspond therewith, and exemplifies the truth of that Scripture, the misery of man is great upon him.

III. Slaveholding, considered in its nature and tendency, affords a notable argument to prove the infinite evil of sin. Sin is said to be an infinite evil, not from the quantity of the action, but from its tendency to dishonor God's infinite character ; so the infinite evil of slaveholding is not estimated by the quantity of the act, but by its tendency, which is infinite.

When a slaveholder, by his last will, leaves his slaves in a state of hereditary bondage, his crime, in the first instance, has the same essential properties of an infinite evil with any other sin : but, as it relates to futurity, its evil tendency is infinite, in a manner peculiar to itself. As,

First—It entails a course of perpetual sinning on his posterity, as he leaves his slaves in their possession, with a right and power to entail the same authority to their children, and so on ad infinitum. Thus, in his last will, he gives to his posterity a charter and power to continue the crime to the end of the world. It will not prevent the evil from being infinite in its nature and tendency, that some of the succeeding generations may cut off the entailment by setting the slaves at liberty ; because the object of his last will, and the power that it conveyed to his posterity, was to entail bondage upon them to the end of the world.

This entailment being cut off by the end of the world, will not change the nature and tendency of the act of entailing implied in the slaveholder's last will ; because, if there was to be a succession of generations to eternity, it could make no difference as to the act of entailing : because, if by his last will he can fix the entailment upon the first generation that succeeds him, he may equally fix the entailment upon all succeeding generations, and if the succession was to be endless, it would be the same : therefore, the moral tendency of slaveholding is, to establish in the slaveholder's posterity a succession of sinning, and that of the highest aggravation, to all eternity.

Secondly—It entails a curse of perpetual misery upon the slaves, so that the infinite evil of the sin of slaveholding may be proved from its tendency in relation to the slaves upon whom the effects of the sin fall ; so that all their ignorance of God, and all their wickedness and defilement of speech and behavior which natively flow from their ignorance, and all the miseries which belong to a state of slavery, are by his deed entailed upon them, and all that complication of horrors, both moral and natural, he entails upon all generations ; and if the generations were to continue to eternity, it would be the same : so that the man who, at his death, leaves his slaves in bondage, commits sin that empowers his posterity to repeat the same crime to all eternity. It is also a moral ground, to cause an eternal punishment to be inflicted upon the innocent, who are not supposed, even by the slaveholders themselves, to merit such treatment. They are the trans-gressors, while the punishment comes upon the innocent. Who then could suppose that slaveholders would attempt to deny the infinite evil of sin, or dispute the eternity of punishment, while, by their own practice, they give such notable examples of both? Yet it is no uncommon thing to find slaveholders most avowed enemies to the infinite evil of sin, and to the doctrine of eternal punishment.

But the highest evidence of the infinite evil of slaveholding, is its tendency to cause the eternal damnation of all that are enslaved. Ignorance of every branch of literature is a necessary appendage of slavery, which implies an utter unacquaintance with God's word, and this prevents them from a knowledge of their lost condition by nature as guilty and depraved, and from a knowledge of the method of justification through faith in Christ, and of regeneration by the Holy Spirit, without which none can be saved.

The word of God binds all heads of families to instruct their families in the knowledge of that word, and shews that all who neglect this duty must be exposed to the wrath of God. But how great must be their guilt and exposure to Divine vengeance who will neither instruct the ignorant themselves, nor suffer them to be taught; and although the holder of slaves should be ever so faithful in teaching the generation that are immediately under his inspection, if at his death he entails hereditary bondage upon them, he does his utmost to entail ignorance upon them to the end of the world, or to shut them out from a knowledge of acceptance through faith in Jesus Christ.—Ezek. iii. 18: "When I say unto the wicked thou shalt surely die, and thou givest him not warning, nor speakest to warn the wicked from his wicked way to save his life, the same wicked man shall die in his iniquity, but his blood will I require at thine hand." The slaves are both wicked and grossly ignorant, while their cruel tyrants will neither instruct them themselves, nor suffer them to be instructed by others, in order that they might forsake their evil ways and live, but entail ignorance upon them to perpetual generations; and if a succession of generations was to continue to eternity, the act of entailing bondage upon them would naturally tend to subject them all to ignorance, and occasion their eternal condemnation; and farther, the posterity of the slaves which are left in bondage by the last will of the testator are liable to multiply to infinity, which will naturally occasion an infinity of eternal penalties, in proportion to the number of subjects. A slaveholder, then, who by his last will and testament leaves his slaves in bondage, commits a crime that tends to produce an eternity of sinning with his own posterity, an eternity of slavery to the blacks, an eternity of damnation to them, and an infinity of eternal penalties. If all these infinities of evils are native consequences of his last will and testament, what idea can be formed of the eternal state of the testator himself.

GRADUALISM.

The foregoing investigation of slavery has been restricted to perpetual hereditary slavery. But there is another branch of slavery which is practised in some states, which though of less aggravation, partakes of the same kind of moral turpitude with the former; it is that of holding the blacks in bondage, until they arrive at the age of 28 years. This practice, when compared with the other, must be less criminal, and is liable to afford some relief to the oppressed.

But it seems to resemble the practice of some thieves, who content themselves with pilfering articles of little value, and small sums of money, but have not courage to rob on the highway. The evils of this partial degree of slavery, are the following:

First—The slaves are kept in ignorance as well as bondage, until they arrive to the age of 28.

Second—They are robbed of seven years of time, of liberty and the profits of their labor.

If it is lawful to hold a man in bondage until he is twenty-eight years of age, it must be equally lawful to hold him to the day of his death; and if it is sinful to hold him to the day of his death, it must partake of the same species of crime, to hold him until he is twenty-eight.

Again; that part of human life which lies between the years of 21 and 28, is that period in which marriages are

THE NEGRO.

And shall the beams of science never shed,
Their light benign upon the negro's head,
Or is he destined still through life to roam,
Bereft of hope beyond the silent tomb.

Far from his home, across the Atlantic deep,
To foreign climes, by rude oppression borne,
The negro toils, and oft in silence weeps,
Weeps for those joys, that never more return.

Perhaps a sire, perhaps a mother dear,
Now deeply drain the bitter cup of wo,
For their dear child, starts forth the trickling tear,
For him, their son, their ceaseless sorrows flow.

Hard is that heart that thus without a sigh,
To slavery's chains, his fellow man condemns,
Forms not his mind to range the spheres on high,
But leaves it deep in hopeless gloom o'erwhelmed.

O must his thoughts survey no brighter skies,
Where pleasures dwell, where endless glories rise,
Where the Redeemer sits enthroned above,
In realms of light, the home of bliss and love.

O when will every clime and every plain,
Be cheer'd by liberty's endearing ray,
When will strict justice force its righteous claim,
And mercy mild, resume its long lost sway.

Columbia speak, let slavery's dirge be sung
Wide o'er the world. The joyful sound begun,
Shall bid the age of crime and suff'ring cease,
And hail the reign of freedom and of peace.

HARP OF INDIANA.

APPENDIX.

THE foregoing view of slavery is by no means the effect of prejudice, against slaveholders in general, or against any individuals of that class of citizens. The writer never had any ground of complaint against them, of a personal nature, but on the contrary has had experience of as polite treatment from slaveholders as from any others with whom he has been conversant; but in reflecting on the civilities of slaveholders towards himself, compared with their treatment of the slaves, he has been led seriously to inquire into the fundamental reason of the strange disparity, and put the question to himself, "What is the reason these people treat me with so much kindness, while it cannot be in return for any service I have ever done to them. It cannot be because my complexion is white, while that of the Africans is black, for we find persons among them in a state of slavery of all shades of color, from the deepest black down to such a degree of white, that a tinge of African blood can hardly be discovered. The blacks are daily doing them service, but they neither make them a just restitution, nor show them any civilities. This seems like inverting the order of moral equity. Their politeness to me, and harshness to the slaves, cannot be attributed to a supreme regard to the law of God as a general rule of duty, for that requires justice before liberality; neither can it arise from a principle of obedience to that second great command, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself;" for that command would lead them to act impartially to all both black and white. I then conclude that this kind treatment must arise from self love or a wish to have a great name, for persons of much liberality and great benevolence, and also to display their own magnificence. Therefore, the great reason why they do not hold me in the same condition of wretchedness with their slaves, is because I am not in their power, but had they an opportunity of subjecting me to the same servile and degraded condition with their slaves, they would, without fail, do it.

LAWS OF KENTUCKY AND VIRGINIA RELATIVE TO SLAVERY.

VOL. 2, chap. 63, section 2—"No negro or mulatto shall be a witness, except in plea of the commonwealth against negroes or mulattoes, or in civil pleas, where negroes or mulattoes alone shall be parties." This law though essential to the existence of slavery is directly opposed to the right of man, and to the moral law, which binds every man according to his knowledge of facts, to bear witness in defence of the innocent, and for the conviction of the guilty; this is a duty which all men owe to both God and their neighbors."

Levit. v. 1 : "And if a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and is witness whether he hath seen or known of it, if he do not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity." Proverbs xxxi. 8, 9 : "Open thy mouth for the dumb in the cause of all such as are appointed to destruction, open thy mouth, judge righteously, and plead the cause of the poor and needy." When the slaves are rendered incapable of bearing testimony in a cause pending before a court, they cannot bear the iniquity, but it devolves with peculiar weight upon the heads of those that prevent them.

Section 3. "No slaves shall go from the tenements of his master or other person with whom he lives without a pass, or some letter or token whereby it may appear that he is proceeding by authority from his master or employer; if he does, it shall be lawful for any person to apprehend and carry him before a justice of the peace, to be by his order punished with stripes or not, in his discretion."

Section 4. "And if any slave shall presume to come and be upon the plantation of any person whatsoever; without leave in writing from his or her owner or overseer, not being sent on lawful business, it shall be lawful for the owner or overseer of such plantation to give or order such slave ten lashes, on his or her bare back, for every such offence."

Suppose a slave had a desire, and found himself bound by the law of God to go to visit some of his sick or dying friends, he could not without permission from his master. Suppose the slaves in a neighborhood to feel themselves bound by the law of God to meet together for the purpose of social worship, they could not do it without permission from their masters or overseers. But for a human creature to be under the necessity of asking permission from man to worship God, is an affront offered to the majesty of God, and the sin lies at the master's door. If the slaves were to attempt the duty without permission, they would be exposed to the cruelty of their persecutors; yet it would undoubtedly be their duty to act in such a case as Daniel did, who in the face of persecution, worshiped God, and left the event to himself. Dan. vi. 10.

For any man wilfully to occupy the station of a slave-master, assuming that power with which such are invested by these two sections of law, so as to have an absolute power to restrain or tolerate the religious exercises of his fellow creatures at his pleasure, is to exalt himself above the God of heaven.

Section 5. "No negro, mulatto, or Indian whatsoever, shall keep or carry any gunpowder, shot, club, or other weapon whatsoever, offensive or defensive, but all and every gun, weapon and ammunition found in the possession or custody of any negro, mulatto, or Indian, may be seized by any person; and upon due proof made before any justice of the peace of the county where such seizure shall be, shall, by his order, be forfeited to the seizer for his own use; and moreover, every such offender shall have and receive, by order of such justice, any number of lashes not exceeding thirty-nine, on his or her back, well laid on, for every such offence."

Agreeable to this section, the most palpable robbery, the most undisguised cruelty and atrocious covetousness are all established by law, which will preclude every conscientious Christian from ever officiating as a justice of the peace, a constable, sheriff, or judge of a court, in any slave state where such laws exist; and exist they must wherever slavery exists.

It appears that among the whole black list of hell-deserving crimes in our world, no one will establish a man's title to perdition with greater certainty than slaveholding, yet every sin has its appendages as well as slavery. If sin must be defended or supported, it can only be done by sin. Slaveholding is a most heinous sin. Hence all laws which are made to support it are sinful; yet all are essential to the permanent existence of slavery in any state.

The seventh section prohibits, by a heavy fine, every head of a family from admitting his neighbor's slave to be or remain on his premises more than four hours at a time, without permission from the owner or overseer. And every owner or overseer is by the same act made liable to pay a heavy fine, who will suffer more than five slaves, other than his own, to be or remain on his plantation at any one time.

The next section grants indulgence to the slaves to meet together on the Lord's day, if licensed in writing by their masters or overseers.

As these two acts imply the essence of tyranny, so they put a final stop to any successful methods of teaching the slaves in schools, whether on the Sabbath or any other day, and make the master to be the entire director of the slave's religion; for they cannot meet together for the worship of God without a written license from the master or overseer.

The tenth section subjects every white person to a fine of fifteen shillings, or twenty lashes well laid on, if found in company with slaves, at any unlawful meeting, or that shall harbor or entertain any slave, without the consent of the owner. Agreeable to this section, no minister of the gospel can preach to a congregation of blacks, without exposing himself to persecution, because any number of slaves above five, is an unlawful meeting. See sect. 10.

The next section lays all justices, sheriffs, and constables, under heavy penalties, who will fail to suppress all unlawful meetings of the slaves.

The twelfth section prohibits all free persons to buy, sell, or receive any coin or commodity from a slave, without the consent of the owner or overseer, under the penalty of four times the value of the article bought, sold or received, with costs of action upon the case.

Section 13. "If any negro, mulatto or Indian, bond or free, shall at any time lift his or her hand in opposition to any person not being a negro, mulatto or Indian, he or she so offending, shall for every such offence, proved by the oath of the party before a justice of the peace of the county where such offence shall be committed, receive thirty lashes, on his or her bare back, well laid on, by order of such justice."

This law makes no allowance for self-defence, in the case of a negro lifting his hand, neither does it make a difference between lifting the hand in a mere threatening attitude, and that of actually striking a blow, nor any allowance on account of the character or behavior of the person against whom he may lift his hand; but the negro is liable to be insulted by the vilest miscreants, to be struck and trampled upon by impudent children, and vile drunkards, without the privilege of defending himself.

The eighteenth section provides, that in consequence of a slave being duly convicted of a capital crime, thirty days shall be allowed him, between his sentence and execution, except in cases of conspiracy, insurrection or rebellion, that is, except he should be convicted of some one or more of those acts of bravery, which would, if committed by his judges, entitle them to the highest applause, were they in the condition of slaves in Africa.

By an act of the Virginia legislature in 1804, all night meetings of the blacks were prohibited, but afterwards in a revised code may be seen an amendment, to the following import:

"Nothing in the said act shall prevent the master or overseer of slaves, from carrying, or permitting his, her or their slave or slaves, to go with him, her or them, or with any part of his, her or their family, to any place for the purpose of religious worship, provided that such worship be conducted by a regularly ordained white minister."

This act implies bloody persecution in its whole structure.

First—The slaves are restrained from meeting together, for public worship, except some of their tyrants are with them.

Second—They are liable to be prevented, for the most part, from ever enjoying the privilege of attending public worship, for this reason, that slave tyrants are not apt to be in the habit of attending places of public worship, but are liable to spend their Sabbaths in idleness and recreations.

Third—If the slaves should thus be permitted to attend upon public worship, they must of necessity be governed by their master's views of religion, in respect to the doctrine taught by the preacher. The amount of the whole matter is, that except the slaves can in conscience agree with their master's religious system, they must by force be restrained from all public ordinances.

Fourth—If the preacher should not be a white man, however sound in the faith, able in doctrine, and profitable in his public administrations, they must not show themselves among his hearers, either with their masters or without them. All these restrictions are most open and undisguised restraints on the consciences of men; and if the slaves should refuse submission to the inquisitorial acts by attempting to worship God agreeable to the dictates of their own consciences, they would first be put to the torture. Should they still persist in their integrity, they would be liable to suffer death.

Many slaveholders grant that to hold men in slavery is wrong; but sound policy makes it necessary to keep them in bondage, because of the dangerous consequences which might result from their general emancipation. But if slaveholding is a moral evil, no supposed consequences will justify a continuance of the practice. We might as well argue that because a man has fled from society for robbery and murder he is in duty bound to continue those practices for his support, lest if he appear in public he will be liable to be brought to justice. God's word forbids us to do evil that good may come. If this command forbids the smallest aggravation of sin to serve our worldly interest or safety, what shall we say of slaveholding, which is the very acmé of sin, that concentrates into one focus all the most capital violations of the moral law. But we have no reason to conclude that even a general emancipation of the slaves would occasion any insurmountable difficulties, while a God of providence governs the world; but although universal devastation was to be the certain consequence of a general emancipation, it would be infinitely better to suffer in our bodies and estates in time, than to dishonor God, and be cast soul and body into hell-fire, where the worm dieth not, and the fire is not quenched.

REPLY TO MR. HARRIS.

A certain Mr. Harris, who has written in favor of slavery, makes use of the fact related in the 47th chapter of Genesis to justify the practice of slavery. Verse 23: "Then Joseph said unto the people, Behold I have bought you this day and your land for Pharaoh. Lo, here is food for you, and ye shall sow the land, and it shall come to pass in the increase, that you shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts shall be your own for seed of the field, for your food and for them of your household, and for food for your little ones. And they said, Thou hast saved our lives, let us find grace in the sight of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants. And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part, except the land of the priests, which became not Pharaoh's."

From the narrative of this transaction, it is evident, 1. That Joseph's purchase of the Egyptians for Pharaoh did not make them slaves to him, but only tenants. 2. Joseph in this whole transaction acted as an agent for Pharaoh; what he did was not to aggrandize himself, but its ultimate tendency related to the king and his subjects. 3. When he established the rent of the land at one-fifth of the increase, Pharaoh was equally bound to let them have their lands for the fifth, and had no power to exact more, and this covenant between Pharaoh and his subjects was made binding to perpetual generations, as the words in verse 26 show: "And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day." 4. It is evident that one-fifth was all the tribute that the renters of lands were obliged to pay to the king, which when collected from all parts of the empire would make a revenue sufficient to support the government.

We shall now inquire whether this new financial scheme tended to injure or to promote the general welfare of the nation ; and, first, it established upon a permanent foundation an ample support to government.

Secondly—It secured to the people from generation to generation a competent support, by establishing to them an inalienable right to four-fifths of the increase of the lands, and thus prevented them from ever being subject to the mercy of oppressive landlords. It is a well known fact that the lands of all countries which are long inhabited, become the exclusive property of an opulent few, while the great mass of the people become renters, and that the rule by which land-holders let their fields or farms to individuals, is not by the intrinsic value of the increase, or what they may lawfully exact from the renter, but what is the highest he can pay consistent with his bare subsistence. In many parts of the United States it is common for renters to pay one-half the increase of the soil ; but in most of European countries, after rents are paid, toll, tribute and custom discharged, most of renters would count themselves very safe if they could save one-fifth. Joseph's plan, while it restrained the power of the king from ever demanding more than the fifth, it secured the people against the unbounded avarice of landlords. The king was landlord of the whole, and he was bound by an established rule, beyond which he could not go.

Thus it appears that Joseph's method of buying the Egyptians and their lands, was so far from enslaving them, that it was the wisest plan that ever was or could be invented to secure them against being slaves either to the king or to one another ; and it is highly probable that the establishment of this wise scheme was the cause that Egypt at an early period excelled all other kingdoms in wealth, power and learning, and an experience of its happy effects might have been a reason why the Egyptians deified Joseph after his death.

A METHOD PROPOSED TO PREVENT ANY DANGEROUS CONSEQUENCES FROM A GENERAL EMANCIPATION OF THE SLAVES.

Although it is impossible to hold any of mankind in a state of unmerited, involuntary, hereditary slavery, without contracting guilt, yet in effecting their general emancipation, such a method ought to be adopted as in the event will be most likely to prove a benefit to the blacks when free, and be no detriment to the peace of society at large.

With much diffidence we shall suggest the following method.

First. In connection with the law of general emancipation, let laws be made for a time to govern them when free, which will in some respects be only an improvement of some of those laws which were formerly made to govern them when in a state of bondage. Let the blacks when free have the privilege of education, without restraint.

Secondly. Let them be admitted to bear testimony in courts of justice as soon as they are competent to know the nature of an oath.

Thirdly. Let no black person be found traveling more than miles from his place of residence, without he can give a satisfactory account of his business, or have a pass from a magistrate.

Fourthly. Let no black man be seen carrying a gun or any destructive weapon without license from a magistrate or some other official character.

Fifthly. Let the blacks have a right to buy, sell, and traffic with the whites in any form they may see fit.

Sixthly. Let them have the privilege of meeting together for public worship without any restraint.

Seventhly. Let patrols be continued for some time in every district where the blacks are numerous, but let them have no power to beat or in any way abuse a black person, should they find him transgressing the law, but let them take him to a magistrate to have his cause tried.

Eighthly. Let magistrates have full power for a time to take cognizance of all petty crimes of the blacks, but let none such be tried but by a jury of from six to twelve men, and to prevent jealousies, and encourage the blacks, one-half of such juries might be of the blacks.

Ninthly.—Where the blacks are numerous in a district, let magistrates and constables be proportionably numerous.

NOTE.

The "Appendix" is retained here, because it was a part of the original publication, and not because it is deemed an appropriate conclusion to so masterly an argument. It may, however, be instructive, even now, on two points; one is, to show by an actual experiment, that a clear exhibition of the sinfulness of slavery and the duty of immediate emancipation, but accompanied with practical provisions for degrading and disfranchising the freed man, did not in fact render the doctrine at all more palatable to the slaveholders, than it has been since, when coupled with the uncompromising demands of "modern abolition;" and the other is, that the clearest exhibitions of sin and duty in the case fell powerless upon the public mind, until in the year 1831, they were faithfully and fearlessly carried out to their just conclusions, and embodied in a public society for the purpose of carrying them into effect. In no other way can it be rationally accounted for, that a work, written with such power, should have fallen so ineffectual upon the public mind, and passed so soon into entire oblivion.—Ed
